NITR PAL SINGH (Defendant-Appellant) v. JAI PAL SINGH (Plaintiff-Respondent) [6th and 7th May and
27th June 1896.]

Hindu law—Family custom—Rajputs—Impartible estate—Primogeniture—Evidence of converging probabilities.

In a Rajput family, of a clan named Jadon Thakur, long settled near Agra, holding an ancestral taluq of zamindari villages, and having their principal dwelling place in one of such villages, the question arose whether, by a family custom, their ancestral property descended as an impartible estate, to be possessed by the eldest son of the last inheritor, or, descended as an ordinary estate, under the Hindu law, to be held jointly by the sons, each having the right to claim partition.

The second of a joint family of three sons now sued the elder, the youngest being a co-defendant, but not taking either side.

The evidence established a family custom that the ancestral property should descend as an impartible estate, and should be possessed by a single heir at a time, who should be the eldest son.

All the lines of evidence, of differing degrees of value, converged towards the same result, the existence of this custom of impartibility, and of primogeniture.

Perhaps no one of these lines, taken alone, would have been conclusive in favour of this right being established in the eldest son. But, when the whole evidence was considered, the converging probabilities were conclusive to maintain the right claimed by the eldest son to exclusive possession.

JUNE 27. APPEAL from a decree (15th April 1889) of the High Court, reversing a decree (24th December 1886) of the Subordinate Judge of Agra.

PRIVY
COUNCIL. The plaintiff, now respondent, was the second of three brothers, who were a joint Hindu family, in which for many generations past had been held a taluq of zamindari villages in what became, in days comparatively recent, the districts of Agra and Etah. The [2] family was Rajput of a clan called Jadon Thakur, and from their village, Umargarh, in the Etah district, which was the family dwelling place, the whole riasat belonging to them was called, on this record.

The plaintiff was a minor, represented by his mother and guardian, Musammat Bijai Kuar, and sued without payment of fees under Chapter XXVI of the Code of Civil Procedure. The third brother, a minor, represented by his mother as his guardian, was a co-defendant, but took no part in the proceedings.

The plaint alleged that Thakur Budh Singh, who died on the 1st July 1881, had by different wives, these three sons: that they were his heirs, no custom differing from the Hindu law prevailing in this family: that Thakur Nitr Pal Singh, having influenced his father, caused his, Nitr Pal's, name to be recorded as proprietor of village Umargarh, with the naglas, or hamlets attached, and that the entry was made in his father's lifetime: and that the plaintiff was entitled to a one-third share, valued at Rs. 47,125 of the estate, on partition, which should be decreed.

The defendant, Nitr Pal Singh, by his written answer asserted that, by a family custom, the whole riasat, taking its name from Umargarh, of the family, was tikait (meaning thereby was exceptional, as being the property of an individual marked with the tika), and was impartible (1); that the estate descended by a rule of primogeniture; that his father, Thakur Budh Pal Singh, had placed him on the masnad, and that the entry in the administration paper of Umargarh and other villages, as to his right, was correct.

The main questions on this appeal were whether the evidence had established that a family custom existed, whereby the estate was impartible, and descended to the eldest son.

The facts, and the evidence under its different heads, are stated in their Lordships' judgment.

The Subordinate Judge of Agra found that the estate was impartible, and that it was rightly in the possession of the defend-[3]ant, in virtue of the family custom alleged by him. The suit was dismissed with costs in the Court of first instance.

A Division Bench of the High Court (EDGE, C. J., and TYRRELL, J.) allowed the plaintiff's appeal, and decreed his claim. Their judgment dealt with the following salient points in the evidence, among others:—

1. The evidence of the genealogist or jaga, the books kept by him, and the pedigree of the brothers, which he produced. To this the appellate Court below attached little, if any, value; and, in their opinion, it was plain that the pedigree afforded no evidence on the question of the impartibility of the estate.

2. Former claim by a member of the family for partition. On the death in 1825 of Moti Singh, who was an only son, his eldest son, Pirthi

(1) Shakespear gives the meaning of "tikait" as—"invested with the tika, or badge of sovereignty."

Raj Singh took the management of the estate. Upon the death of the latter, when a few years had elapsed, a claim to a share in the estate was made by one of the widows of the deceased Moti Singh, on behalf of her son, whom she had borne to Moti Singh, named Sheobaran Singh. This claim was preferred after Pirthi Raj's death against his elder son Tikam Singh.

3. Award of an arbitrator in 1842. The claim on behalf of Sheobaran having been referred to the arbitration of a neighbour, and lessee of an indigo factory, Mr. Hamilton Bell, his award thereon was made in 1843, and was upheld by the Sadr Dewani Adalat at Agra in 1845. This award declared the inheritance to be impartible, but it was not acted upon. The High Court as to it said, "Apparently the award left two-thirds of the property to Tikam Singh and transferred the proprietary right in the remaining one-third to Sheobaran Singh. Practically the transaction was one of partition, dividing the family property and giving the allottees exclusive control over their shares." The documentary evidence led the High Court to the inference "that this award was treated as a dead letter."

4. The ceremonial of gaddinashini. The High Court believes that some ceremonials of placing Budh Singh, and afterwards Nitr Pal Singh, on the gaddi or masnad, did take place. But the Court [4] observed that no witness professed to have seen similar ceremonials in the case of Tikam Singh, Pirthi Singh, or any other member of the family. Nor was it in their opinion proved that the customs of gaddinashini, and of impartibility, necessarily co-existed, and they believed the contrary to be the fact in Thakur families. They thought that the tikait Gaddinashini ceremonials were first practised in the family after the dispute between Tikam Singh and Sheobaran Singh; and in order to make evidence of a tikait Gaddinashini family, if they took place at all.

5. The entries in the wajib-ul-araiz of villages composing the riasat, comprising also the entries relating to the hereditary holding by the head of the family of the office of lambardar. The High Court found that the wajib-ul-arz of Umargarh of the year 1854 contained nothing from which the existence of the custom of primogeniture in this family could be inferred. They found on coming to the wajib-ul-arz of 1876 that here the custom was set forth. This, however, the Court at the same time found to be an entry dictated by Budh Singh, the father of the present litigants; and the Court therefore attached little, if any, value to it as evidence of the alleged custom.

6. In addition to the above there was the oral evidence of witnesses. This the Court examined.

The judgment expressed that the documentary evidence on the record was decidedly adverse to the existence of the alleged custom. The Judges found no document on the file of a date prior to the dispute between the guardian of Sheobaran and Tikam Singh.

The case, in their opinion, was not like those in which a custom has been established by the production of documents of old dates. In this the documents of date anterior to 1876, far from supporting the alleged custom, showed that when the custom was alleged it was at once denied, and that the person on whose behalf it was disputed got a substantial portion of the family property. The Judges could not rely upon the hearsay evidence put forward on behalf of the defendant as to what was the state of the family prior to 1843. They pointed out that, in regard to the title "Rao," Budh

And that in regard to the statements made on the 12th December 1881 by the ladies of the household, those who made the statements were pardanashin ladies residing in the house of the defendant. And that neither in the award of 1843, nor in the judgment of the Sadar Court of 1845, was there allusion to this family being a tikait family.

The judgment ended, on the main question, thus :—
“ We have come to the conclusion that no custom of impartibility existed in the family, and that the ordinary Hindu law applies. We have also come to the conclusion that this was not a family in which the eldest male was entitled to the title of, or was known as, Raja or Rao, and in which the practice of tikait and of the gaddi came first into existence after the disputes between Tikam Singh and Sheobaran Singh. At any rate, we are satisfied that the contrary is not proved.”

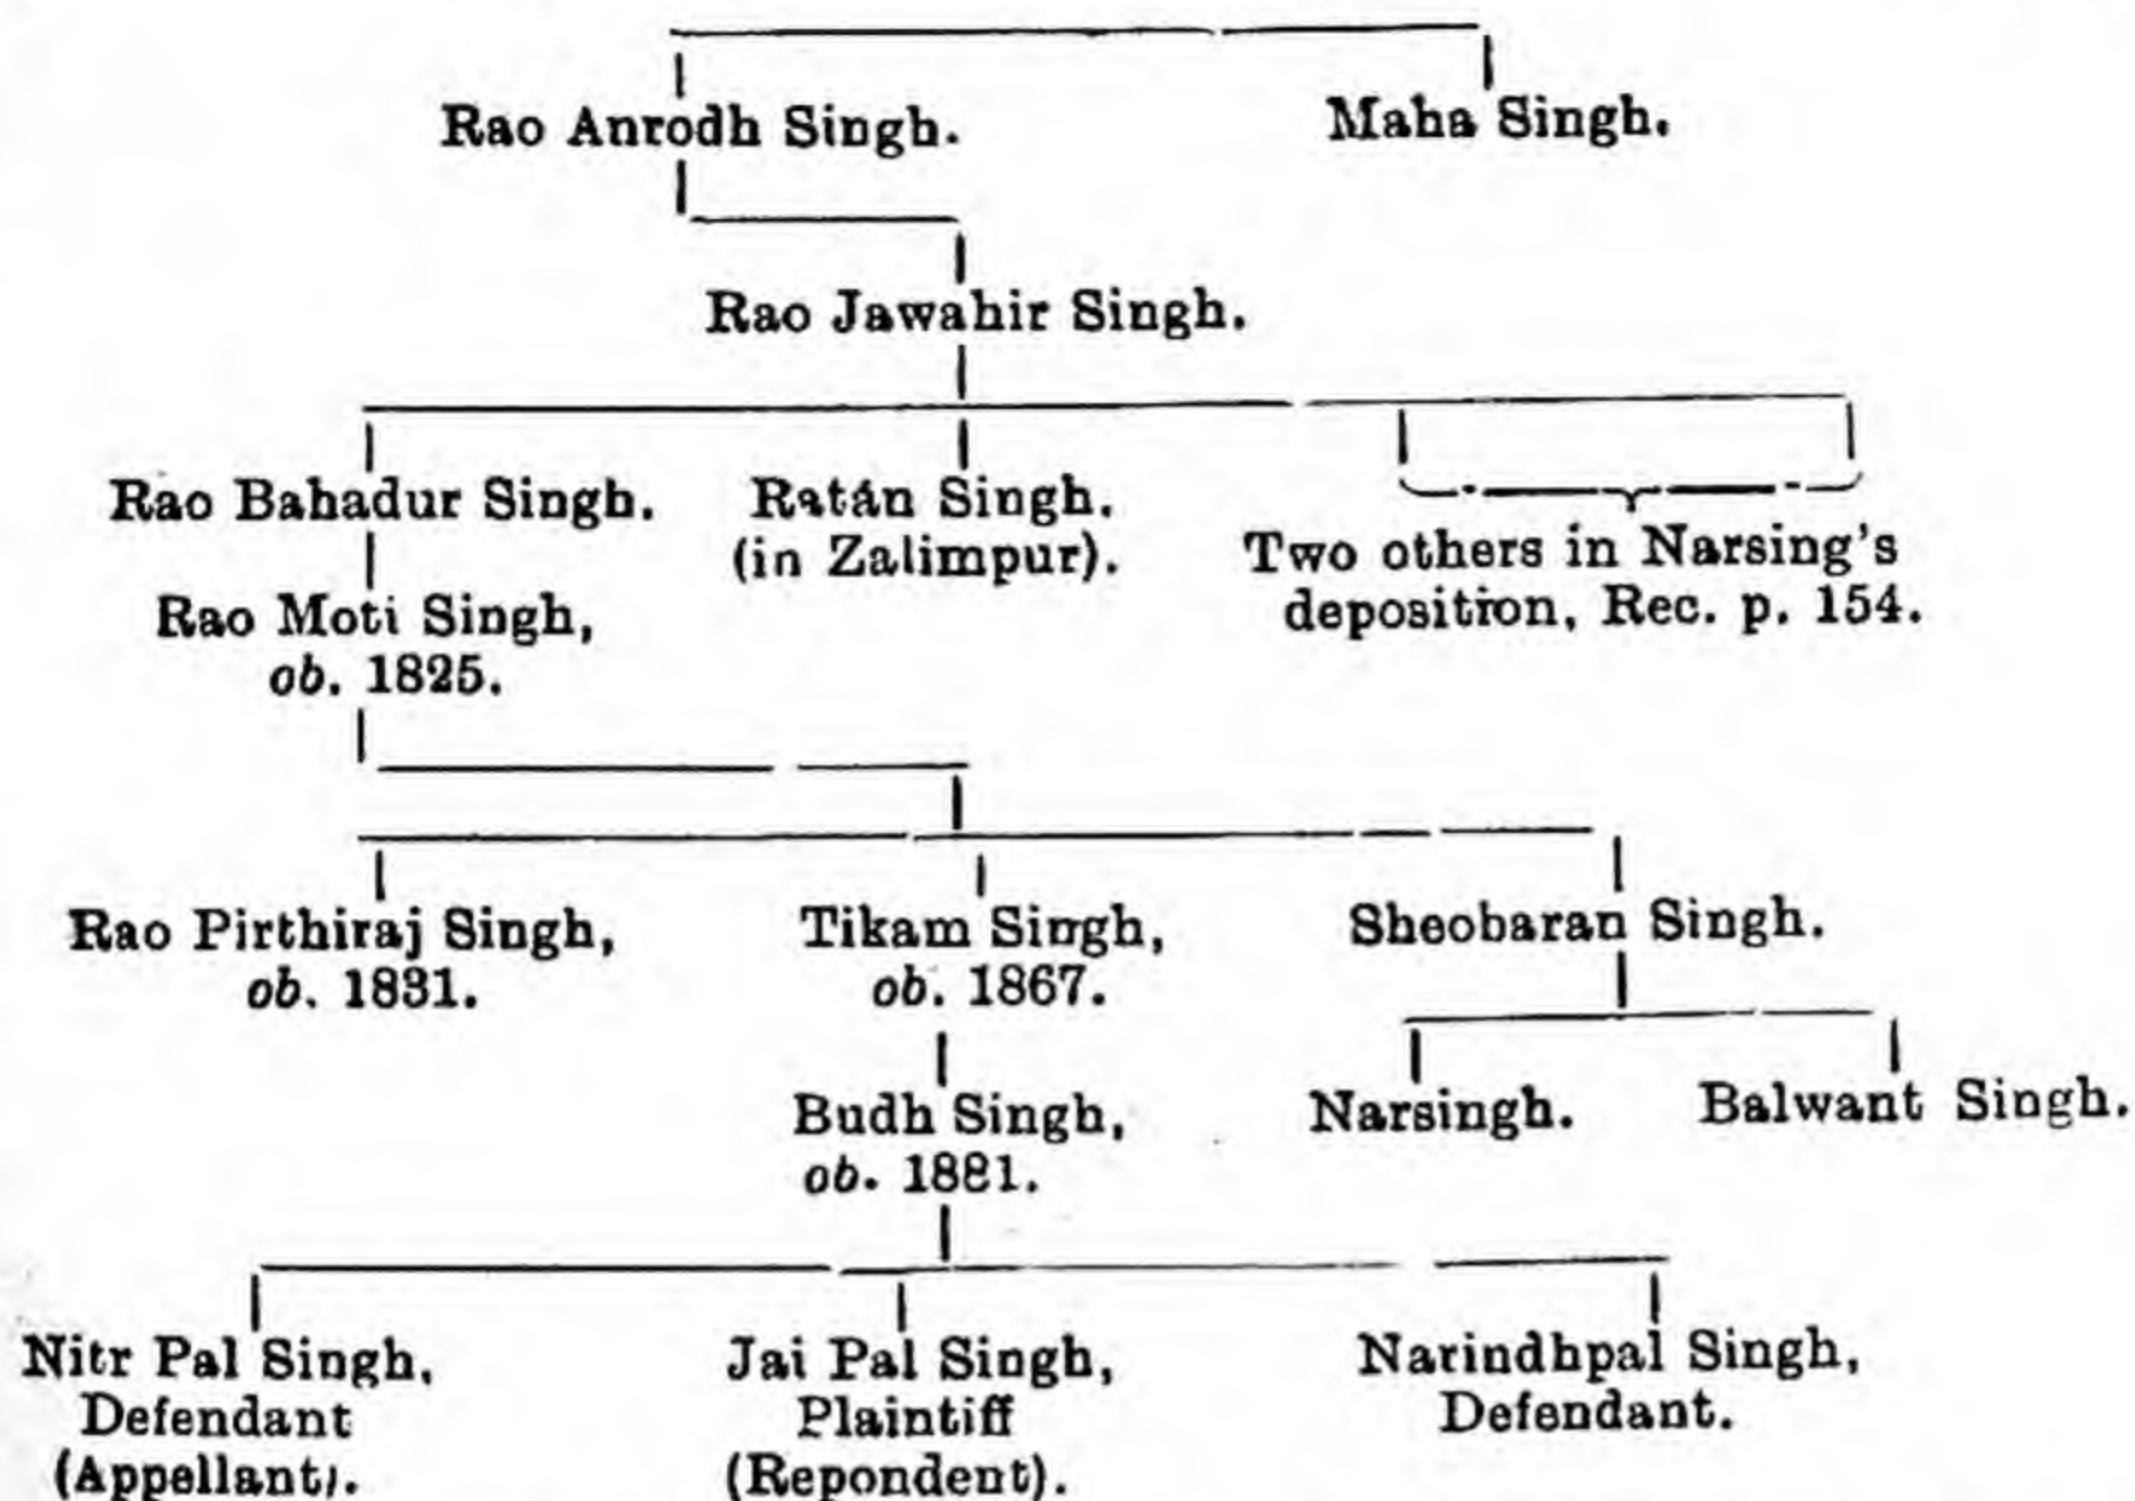

On the appeal of Thakur Nitr Pal Singh, Mr. J. D. Mayne and Mr. A. J. Wallach, for the appellant, argued that the conclusions of the High Court that the family custom had not been proved were against the weight of the evidence. That there should be customs to the effect alleged accorded well with the known and proved circumstances of this family, and these customs were affirmed by oral testimony, while a large body of documentary evidence, in varied ways, supported the same result. The evidence was reviewed in their argument, and reference was made to the occurrence in the history of some impartible estates of their having been divided off from more ancient and larger impartible zamindaris; for instance, in The Collector of Madura v. Moottoo Ramalinga (1) and Katama Natchiar v. The Rajah of Shivagunga (2). The respondents did not appear. Afterwards, on June 27th, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD HOBHOUSE :—

JUDGMENT.

[6] The question in this appeal is whether the ancestral property of a Rajput family long settled in the Agra district devolves according to ordinary Mitakshara law, or is subject to the custom of primogeniture. The Courts below have differed in opinion upon the evidence, the Subordinate Judge thinking that the custom is established, and the High Court that it is not, so that it becomes the duty of this Board to say whether the evidence is such as to make it right to restore the original decision.

The family is one of Rajputs belonging to a clan, apparently numerous, called Jadon Thakurs. Their estate and place of residence is the taluq or riasat of Umargarh. One of the witnesses named Bhairon states that he is the Jaga (something apparently corresponding to a bard or herald or genealogist) of this family and of all other Jadon Thakurs; and that he kept books compiled by himself, his father and his elders, containing pedigrees of those families. He produced the book relating to Umargarh which professes to show the heads of the family and some of the younger sons for 27 generations. Some parts of the evidence will be better understood if so much of it as relates to the last six generations is set out here.

[7] The plaintiff is a younger son of Budh, claiming to have the estate divided. The eldest son, who resists that claim, is the principal defendant. Another son who did not join in the plaintiff's claim was made a defendant, and now takes no active part in the proceedings. Both the younger sons are minors.

The Subordinate Judge of Agra decided in favour of the custom, and dismissed the suit. Omitting some minor points, the main grounds of his decision may be stated under the following heads:—(a) The pedigree made out by Bhairon, coinciding as it does with a large amount of tradition among the Umargarh family and their kinsfolk, the Jadon Thakurs, shows that the family is ancient and noble, and has been in possession of the taluq of Umargarh and of various villages appertaining thereto for many generations. (b) The family property has never been the subject of partition. (c) The heads of it ascertained by primogeniture have been installed on the gaddi with public ceremonies. (d) The first claim for partition by a younger son, made in 1831, was resisted and finally defeated in 1845. (e) The property in suit has since been enjoyed by the head of the family as sole owner. (f) The members of the family, with the exception of the actual claimants for partition, have declared their belief in the custom of primogeniture. (g) There is substantial evidence to the same effect among their kinsfolk the Jadon Thakurs. (h) The evidence adduced by the defendant stands unrefuted by any substantial evidence for the plaintiff. Their Lordships will proceed to show the objections taken by the High Court to these positions, and to examine the evidence bearing on them.

Head (a).—The High Court point out the inconclusive nature of Bhairon's pedigree. No doubt a document of this kind compiled from papers handed down from Jaga to Jaga and probably supplemented by tradition, must be taken with much reserve; and its obscurity is increased in this case by the fact that it is written in a peculiar dialect or character known only to the Jaga, and by the further circumstance that it is difficult to understand from the record what is represented as the precise language of the book, and what [8] is the language of Bhairon himself. Their Lordships hesitate to attach importance to such expression as "succeeded to the Gaddi," or to the appearance of the dignified title "Rao" which is prefixed to the head of each generation. Still there is no suggestion that Bhairon is untruthful; and the contradictions between his pedigree and other parts of the evidence which are dwelt on by the High Court are quite insignificant. They cannot doubt that the Jaga books represent with fidelity the traditions and belief in the Umargarh family, or that the family is a noble one of very long standing in the country. Indeed, as the Subordinate Judge points out, the plaintiff has made no suggestion to the contrary. The Jadon Thakurs who give evidence for him all believe in a common ancestor many generations ago; and the High Court, though unable to attach any value to the pedigree, are satisfied that the Umargarh family is an old one, and socially of considerable importance.

Head (b).—But then they say that the pedigree affords no evidence of impartibility. Certainly it affords no explicit evidence, nor does it profess to do so. The High Court, however, think that the absence of partition for many generations is as consistent with partibility as with primogeniture, unless it is shown that partition was claimed and refused. Of course if that was shown it would be very cogent evidence in favour of primogeniture. And it is possible that a divisible estate may remain undivided for a long time. But their Lordships do not think it probable that any great number of generations would pass without any operation of the motives under which Sheobaran acted fifty years ago and the plaintiff is acting now. Anrooh had a younger brother, and nothing is known of partition. Bahadur had a younger brother (three, if Narsingh is correct) and we hear nothing of partition. The High Court, indeed, finding that Ratan is stated to be "in Zalimpur," suggest that he may have been there by partition. But we find from the taluq papers that in 1855 Zalimpur was vested in Tikam. The probability is rather that it was given to Ratan for maintenance, and on his death fell into the taluq. Prior to Sheobaran there is no tradition or rumour of a partition suggested on the plaintiff's [9] part. To put it at the lowest, that lays a ground for the favourable reception of evidence in favour of primogeniture; or, to put it higher, makes it probable that primogeniture is the real custom of the family.

Head (c).—The High Court are prepared to believe that some ceremonial of gaddinashini did take place in the cases of the defendant and his father Budh. In fact, such ceremonies are proved by numerous eye-witnesses, invited for the occasion, wholly unshaken in cross-examination, and not contradicted except by other neighbours who were not invited and did not see what took place. And as to the defendant the evidence is corroborated by Budh's petition in the Collector's office, which prays for a mutation of names, and which was allowed by an order of the 15th of February 1877, in spite of an objection made by somebody, by whom is not clear.

The High Court attenuate the significance of installation by two remarks. First they say that no witness professes to have seen any similar ceremonials in respect of Tikam, Pirthi, or any other member of the family. Now Pirthi acceded in the year 1825, 61 years before the evidence was taken, and Tikam six years later. None of the witnesses examined is old enough to have seen them installed. But as to Tikam there is evidence that Narsingh saw him occupying the gaddi, and that Balmakund, a Jadon Thakur, heard from his father that Tikam was placed on the gaddi and remained in its possession. His widow Bijai speaks to the same effect. Aman Singh, another Jadon Thakur, heard about the installation of Pirthi and his father Moti from the Jagas. Of course as the time becomes more remote the evidence becomes fainter; but there is evidence of family tradition as far back as Anroth, in accordance with Bhairon's pedigree. Their Lordships cannot concur with the opinion of the High Court that the gaddi ceremonies were invented to make evidence after the dispute with Sheobaran, nor is it easy to see the motive for making evidence at that time.

[10] The other remark is a suggestion that there is no necessary connection between gaddinashini and primogeniture. That may be so, but it is impossible to read the evidence without seeing that the witnesses on both sides treat the two as identical, or the former as proving the latter. Not a single question is put to any witness who has affirmed or denied gaddinashini for the purpose of disconnecting it from primogeniture. Not only so, but the plaintiff's uncle Sukh Ram, being expressly questioned on the point, says that if the gaddi custom is proved the plaintiff will not get a share. And Raja Shankar Singh, who gives much information about family customs in the Agra district, speaks of gaddinashini and primogeniture as generally coincident. It is clear that the Subordinate Judge had no suspicion that the evidence applying to gaddinashini could be taken as not applying to primogeniture. The first suggestion of such a distinction comes from the High Court. Their Lordships think that when the witnesses affirm or deny gaddinashini they mean to affirm or deny primogeniture; and their constant identification of the two shows how closely they are connected in the minds of the families of that part of the country. The custom of gaddinashini has clearly an important bearing upon that of primogeniture, though the connection between them may not be a necessary one.

Head (d).—This brings us to the stage of the family history in which actual controversies on this question have sprung up, and they require some careful attention. On the death of Moti in the year 1825, the eldest of his three sons, Pirthi, became head of the family. Whether he was formally placed on the gaddi has been discussed above; he certainly represented the estate on the Collector's books and during his life no question as to the ownership was raised. He died in 1831, when his brother Tikam became head. It seems that immediately afterwards the widow of Moti raised a claim on behalf of the youngest son, then a minor, to have the estate divided. An agreement was made deferring the question till Sheobaran's attainment of full age, and then another agreement was made appointing Mr. Bell to be arbitrator. Mr. Bell was a [11] proprietor of indigo works in Umargarh, and he held a mortgage created by Moti on the estate.

The precise tenor of the questions referred is one of the many things which are left in obscurity on this Record. In his award, which is dated 16th January 1843, Mr. Bell states them as being the difference existing between the brothers connected with the pretensions of Sheobaran to a joint interest in the estate. After referring to two agreements, and a decree of Court, none of which are produced, and to the testimony of neighbouring zamindars and younger branches of the family, he states that custom has determined the descent of the estate in one individual. Then he refers to "the avowed inclination of Thakur Tikam Singh that his younger brother should receive such allowance as may enable him to support himself in a manner consistent with the respectability of his descent;" and proceeds to award that Sheobaran should have six villages and a plot of land in full proprietorship, and should have no further claim upon the taluq.

Sheobaran was not content with this award, but immediately afterwards sued for his full share in the estate. Tikam insisted on his right as eldest brother, and also pleaded the award. Nawab Kuar the widow of Pirthi, who was a defendant, supported Tikam. She alleged that she was entitled to one-third of the estate, only "by reason of the family usage, and of Tikam Singh being seated on the gaddi, she has refrained from making any claim." The Sudder Amin gave Sheobaran a decree on the ground that primogeniture could not prevail except in the families of Rajas and Ravats; whereas the Umargarh family did not bear either of those titles. As for the award, he held it to be invalid on grounds which have nothing to do with the present question. They were overruled by the Sudder Court, who, on the ground that Mr. Bell had decided the case in favour of Tikam, reversed the decree below, and dismissed the suit. Their decree is dated the 1st of December 1845.

From this litigation in the Civil Court we get no additional light thrown upon the family custom, unless it be the declaration [12] of Pirthi's widow. The Sudder Amin did not discuss it, but thought that the question of primogeniture turned on the use or non-use of certain appellations. The Sudder Court had not to express any opinion about it, and did not:—

As to the bearing of the award, the High Court take a view which their Lordships cannot understand. They say:—

"Practically, the transaction was one of partition, dividing the family property and giving the allottees exclusive control over their shares.

"Mr. Bell, in making the award, may have considered that the practice, which is not unusual in some places, of giving one portion to the eldest brother—a larger share—was one which he might follow.

"However this may be, we are satisfied that the award operated to transfer to Sheobaran Singh the absolute right in the awarded villages in a manner absolutely inconsistent with there being the custom alleged."

This is in direct contravention of the language of Mr. Bell, who states that his award is not by way of partition, which is prohibited by the family custom, but by way of voluntary allowance for Sheobaran's support in a manner consistent with his position. Mr. Bell may have made his award on insufficient grounds, or without due inquiry, but his opinion is clear. And the opinion of a resident in Umargarh, who had dealings with the estate, was a friend of the family, and was so trusted by them that they called him in to settle the question of primogeniture between them, must have weight in a controversy on that subject. The suggestion that Mr. Bell did not act in good faith, but lent himself to the manufacture of evidence, has no basis of fact that their Lordships can find.

Head (e).—After all, the award was not acted on. On 18th May 1848 Tikam, declaring that he was full proprietor of mauza Bechupura, one of the Umargarh villages not awarded to Sheobaran, made it over absolutely to Sheobaran by way of provision and maintenance. On the 3rd of July 1854 a wajib-ul-arz for taluqa Umargarh was framed on the declarations of the mukhtars of Tikam and Sheobaran. By it Sheobaran is shown to be owner in possession of Bechupura and pattidar of the taluq of Umargarh, and Tikam appears as the owner of several villages, among which [13] are five of the six awarded to Sheobaran. It is calculated that the awarded villages were about one-third in value of the whole taluq, and that the property ultimately taken by Sheobaran was much less, possibly only one-third of the amount awarded. The subsequent enjoyment has been in accordance with the recorded titles.

This change of arrangement remains totally unexplained, and the High Court appear on that account to throw blame on the defendant and suspicion on his case. If the defendant could have produced the proceedings which led up to the award they might have been material. But we are not discussing the validity or legal effect of the award, but the amount of light which it throws on the alleged custom; and it is difficult to suppose that arrangements superseding the award to the disadvantage of the younger brother would disclose circumstances to weaken the title of the elder. Of course the plaintiff might have compelled an investigation of those matters in the first Court; but it does not seem to have occurred to anybody that it was useful to do so, and probably it was not.

The wajib-ul-arz of 1854 does not contain any statement of the family custom of inheritance. In wajib-ul-araiz of separate mauzas made in 1876 there are statements importing that primogeniture is the custom; but as some of them are shown to have been dictated by Budh, and perhaps all were, they do not add to the weight of his opinion shown in other ways. The point for which the wajib-ul-arz of 1854 was used is that it contains a statement relating to lambardars. It says that on the death of a lambardar his eldest son becomes lambardar according to the custom of the family.

The High Court treat this as totally immaterial, because they say the choice of lambardar has nothing to do with the succession to the estate, and that partible estates may have the custom of hereditary lambardars. This they prove by referring to Kasba Jalesar. It is difficult to see how Jalesar is an instance. As with so many other matters in this record, the evidence is obscure. [14] There are two extracts from a wajib-ul-arz. No date is affixed to them. By their contents they would seem to have been framed in the lifetime of Pirthi. Seoti Ram, to whom the High Court refer as showing Budh's dictation of the wajib-ul-araiz of 1876, knows nothing about Jalesar. Supposing these extracts to be Budh's work, their only effect is that the lambardarship is hereditary and will go to the eldest son of the masnadnashin; and the estate also will go to his eldest son. But there are three castes in the Kasba which have different customs, and one of those castes (viz., the Syed caste, which their Lordships presume to be Muhammadan) conforms to the Muhammadan law. That is quite consistent with the descent by primogeniture of the property of the riasat whose chiefs are hereditary lambardars, and does not detract from the bearing, whatever it may be, of the devolution of lambardarship upon the devolution of property in the same family.

A lambardar represents the estates in all transactions with the Government. It is of importance that he should be of capacity for business, and it is usual in a joint family to appoint one of the elder members of the family. When it is found that the office devolves by primogeniture in a family (and there is no suggestion that the wajib-ul-arz speaks falsely), it seems to their Lordships a material circumstance to aid the conclusion that the estate devolves in the same way in the same family.

Heads (f), (g) and (h) may be taken together. Bijai Kuar is the widow of Tikam, and learned about the family customs from Moti's widow and presumably from her husband. Besides speaking of primogeniture in general terms, she says that after Moti's death Pirthi obtained the gaddi, and that Tikam and Sheobaran got maintenance. The statement of Pirthi's widow against the interest she claimed as hers in the suit of 1843 has been before mentioned. On the death of Budh some inquiry was held, apparently with reference to the entry of the estate in the Collector's books. One of his widows, Rathorji also called Bijai, deposed to the mutation of names in Budh's time, and to his intention that the defendant should succeed according to the family custom. Another [15] of his widows, Solankhi the mother of Narindhpal, also deposes to the custom on the same occasion. Neither of those two widows have been examined in the present suit, but their depositions have been put in and treated as evidence. Narsingh, the son of Sheobaran, speaks to the succession from Anrodh's time, according with Bhairon's pedigree, except that he ascribes to Jawahir three younger sons instead of one. He says that he heard from his father. He is open to the observation that he gives an impossible date to one communication from his father, that his father died when he was about 11 years old, and that he is indebted to the defendant, to what amount does not appear. Unless it be for the debt, he does not seem to have any interest to support traditions in which he does not believe.

Seven Jadon Thakurs, and another neighbouring Thakur of a different caste, affirm the custom in general terms, and also establish the installation of the defendant and his father by direct evidence, and affirm other installations by tradition and hearsay. Their evidence varies in detail and is not given by rote. It is quite unshaken by cross-examination.

All this evidence is subject to the observation that it is given after the dispute with Sheobaran, that the ladies are pardanashin, that the witnesses speak to what they have heard when very young, and so forth. These observations would have much greater weight if there had been any dispute before Sheobaran's time, or if there were evidence conflicting with that given for the defendant. But within the family itself there is no conflict of opinion. The plaintiff has produced no evidence but that of several Thakurs, Jadon and others, who deny the custom in general terms and in identical language. But the value of their denial, small in itself, is reduced to nothing by the fact that they also deny the installation of Budh and the defendant, which are proved by conclusive evidence. One of them indeed, Hari Ram, says that 20 or 22 years ago the riasat was partitioned in his presence. But he only adduces as proof some remarks which Tikam made to him quite at variance with the [16] known facts. And he does not even know that Sheobaran ever sued for a partition.

The High Court say that the plaintiff's witnesses must have known of the custom if it had existed, and ought to be believed. But people who knew nothing of the gaddi custom or of actual installations are not likely to have known or cared anything about the custom of inheritance. There need be no imputation on their veracity, for, with the exception of Hari Ram, they only speak to negatives, and are guilty of nothing worse than the common error of assuming the non-existence of that which is not known to them.

Their Lordships conclude that there is no contradiction of the defendant's case; and that the propositions of the Subordinate Judge are established by sufficient proof. All the lines of evidence here examined converge upon the same point. Perhaps no one of them would, if standing alone, be conclusive in favour of the defendant's case; but taken as a whole they are conclusive. The High Court should have dismissed the plaintiff's appeal, and it is now right to discharge their order and to restore that of the Subordinate Judge, and to direct that the respondent shall pay the costs of his appeal to the High Court. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to this effect. The respondent must pay the costs of this appeal.

Interpretation of document—Devise by a Hindu in favour of a female—Presumption as to intention of testator concerning the estate to be taken by the devisee.

One M. R., a separated Hindu, died in 1862, leaving him surviving two daughters and a daughter-in-law, Musammat Sohni, the widow of a pre-deceased son.

[17] During his lifetime M. R. had caused to be recorded in the wajib-ul-arzes of two villages, D. and A., owned by him—"Musammat Sohni, wife of my son Salig Ram, shall be regarded as owner after my death." In the wajib-ul-arz of a third village the following entry was recorded—"After my death Ganga Sahai the adopted son, and Musammat Sohni, the wife of Salig Ram, shall have a right to the property."

Subsequently to the death of M.R. the nature of the estate taken by Musammat Sohni in the villages D. and A. came before a Court of law and Musammat Sohni did not challenge the decree which was then passed declaring her interest to be only a life estate.

Moti Ram died during the lifetime of Sohni. Upon her death, the defendants obtained mutation of names in their favour and took possession of the property, which is still in their possession.

The present suit was instituted on the 25th of August, 1893, by three out of the five sons of Moti Ram's daughters. They claim a three-fifths share of the property, together with mesne profits, on [18] the allegation that they are entitled to that share and have been wrongfully kept out of possession. The first two defendants are the remaining grandsons of Moti Ram. The other defendants are the descendants of his brother Hulas Rai.

The main defence to the suit was limitation, the defendants urging that the possession of Musammat Sohni was adverse to the plaintiffs. Ganga Sahai, the second defendant, raised a further plea to the effect that he had been adopted by Moti Ram.

The Court below found on both points in favour of the plaintiffs and made a decree in their favour. The defendants have appealed, and they have repeated in their memorandum of appeal the grounds on which they contested the claim in the Court below.

There can be no question, and it is indeed conceded, that as the inheritance to Moti Ram's estate opened out in 1862, the plaintiffs' claim would be barred by the law of limitation, unless they could pray in aid the estate held by Musammat Sohni after Moti Ram's death. The whole question therefore hinges on the nature of that estate. As the husband of Musammat Sohni predeceased Moti Ram, she was not entitled to succeed to Moti Ram's property by right of inheritance. The plaintiffs state in their plaint that she obtained possession under the will of Moti Ram recorded in the administration paper of two villages, and that the estate conferred on her by the will was that of a Hindu widow, which terminated on her death. In the wajib-ul-arz of Daryapur Moti Ram caused the following statement to be recorded:—"Musammat Sohni, wife of my son Salig Ram, shall be regarded as the owner (malik) after my death." A similar entry was made in the wajib-ul-arz of Alawalpur, with the addition of the words—"No other person shall have anything to do with this property." Both parties are agreed that the statements recorded in the wajib-ul-arzes amounted to a testamentary bequest in favour of Sohni. They differ as to the nature of the estate devised to her. Whilst the plaintiffs contend that the said estate was that of a Hindu widow, it is urged on behalf of the defendants that an absolute gift was made in favour of Sohni [19] under the will of Moti Ram. We have therefore to construe the said will.

The rule as to the construction of the will of a Hindu was thus stated by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sreemutty Soorjeemoney Dossee v. Denobundoo Mullick (1):—"The Hindu law no less than the English law points to the intention as the element by which we are to be guided in determining the effect of a testamentary disposition; nor, so far as we are aware, is there any difference between the one law and the other as to the materials from which the intention is to be collected. Primarily the words of the will are to be considered. They convey the expression of the testator's wishes; but the meaning to be attached to them may be affected by surrounding circumstances, and where this is the case those circumstances no doubt must be regarded. Amongst the circumstances thus to be regarded, is the law of the country under which the will is made and the dispositions are to be carried out. If that law has attached to particular words a particular meaning, or to a particular disposition a particular effect, it must be assumed that the testator, in the dispositions which he has made, had regard to that meaning or to that effect, unless the language of the will or the surrounding circumstances displace that assumption."

In Moulvie Mahomed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewukram (1) their Lordships observed:—"In construing the will of a Hindu it is not improper to take into consideration what are known to be the ordinary notions and wishes of Hindus with respect to the devolution of property. It may be assumed that a Hindu generally desires that an estate, specially an ancestral estate, shall be retained in his family; and it may be assumed that a Hindu knows that, as a general rule, at all events, women do not take absolute estates of inheritance which they are enabled to alienate."

Bearing these observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council in mind, we have to construe the will of Moti Ram.

[20] We are unable to agree with the contention of the learned counsel for the respondents that every bequest in favour of a Hindu widow should be regarded as the bequest of a life estate only, unless the contrary appears from the terms of the testamentary instrument. In Hira Bai v. Lakshmi Bai (2), on which the learned counsel has relied, all that the learned Judges held was that "in the absence of express words showing such an intention, a devise to a wife does not confer an estate of inheritance, but carries only a widow's estate as understood by Hindu law" (at p. 378). The learned Judges referred to Koonjbehari Dhur v. Premchand Dutt (3), as an authority for that view. The case referred to was that of a gift in favour of a wife by her husband, and it was decided on the authority of the Tagore Law Lectures for 1878, p. 333. There the learned author, in dealing with the restrictions on a woman's power over her stridhan, remarked that the power of a woman over immoveable property obtained in gift from her husband is not absolute, and she has no right of alienation at any rate during the lifetime of the husband, unless such right is expressly conferred on her by the husband. The present case is not that of a gift made by a husband in favour of his wife. Musammam Sohni was the widow of a pre-deceased son of Moti Ram, and the rule of Hindu law relating to the stridhan of a widow acquired under a gift from her husband cannot apply to her. It is not necessary for us to say for the purposes of this appeal whether or not we agree with the view expressed in the rulings cited above as to the right of a widow taking property under a gift from her husband. In our opinion where the terms of a bequest are ambiguous we have to look to the intention of the person making the bequest, and if from the surrounding circumstances it appears that the intention was to make a bequest of a widow's estate only, that intention should be given effect to and the estate devised should be held to be a widow's estate only. In the present instance the recital in the wajib-ul-arzes, which must be regarded as testamentary instruments, is, as we have said, to the effect that Sohni should be regarded as the [21] malik after the death of Moti Ram, the testator. There are no clear words conferring on her an absolute proprietary title. The use of the word malik (owner) is consistent both with an intention to bestow on her a widow's estate and also the estate of an absolute owner. In the wajib-ul-arz of a third village, Pali, which is not in dispute in this case, Moti

Ram said :—"After my death Ganga Sahai, the adopted son, and Musammat Sohni, the wife of Salig Ram, shall have a right to the property." The circumstance of his associating the name of Ganga Sahai with that of Sohni, and the use of the vague expression referred to above indicate in our opinion that the intention of Moti Ram was not to give to Sohni an absolute estate. This conclusion is fortified by the fact that Sohni herself and the defendants and their predecessors in title submitted to a finding of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut made in a suit decided on 21st August 1868, to the effect that Sohni held a widow's estate only in respect of the property left by Moti Ram. That suit was instituted by some of the defendants and the predecessors in title of the other defendants to set aside a mortgage executed by Sohni, and for recovery of possession of the property of Moti Ram held by her. In that suit it was held that she had a life estate in the property and that the alienation would be valid during her lifetime. Both Sohni and the plaintiffs to that suit submitted to that judgment. We do not imply that that judgment operates as res judicata in the present case or can be treated as evidence, as between the present parties, as to the nature of Sohni's title. But we cannot lose sight of the fact that Sohni acquiesced in that judgment which declared her to have only a life estate, and, so far as is shown, took no steps to assert an absolute proprietary title. The present defendants allowed Sohni to continue in possession; and when on her death they applied for mutation of names, on the 5th of October 1881, they referred in their application to the decree of the 21st of August 1868 and stated that, as under that decree Sohni and the transferees from her were to remain in possession during her lifetime, they, the applicants, were entitled to have their names entered in the revenue papers after her death. [22] These circumstances show that the defendants themselves understood the bequest made by Moti Ram in favour of Sohni to be that of a widow's estate. There can be no doubt that the defendants have not a better title to the property than the plaintiffs. But that fact alone would not certainly entitle the plaintiffs to a decree, if the possession of Sohni was under an adverse proprietary title. Having regard to the terms in which Moti Ram bestowed the property on her, to the inference to be drawn as to his intention from the general understanding among Hindus as to the nature of a woman's estate and to the fact that she herself and the defendants, or their predecessors in-title, regarded her estate as that of a Hindu widow with limited right, we are of opinion that the Court below has rightly held that the plaintiffs were equally entitled with the defendants to succeed to Moti Ram's estate on the death of Musammat Sohni. This appeal, therefore, fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Held that a suit will lie to set aside an order passed under S. 293 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Held also that the fact that certificates provided for by S. 293 of the Code has not been granted will not prevent the decree-holder or the judgment-debtor, as the case may be, from recovering from the defaulter the deficiency arising on a re-sale of property sold in execution of a decree but not paid for.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

[23] KNOX, BLAIR AND AIKMAN, JJ.—The parties to this second appeal are Babu Deokinandan Rai, and Sheobalak Rai, who have been compelled by an order made under s. 293 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to pay the deficiency of price which happened on a re-sale of property purchased by them and not paid for, and Tapesri Lal and others, the judgment-creditors, who by virtue of that order recovered from Babu Deokinandan Rai and Sheobalak Rai, the aforesaid deficiency of price and the expenses on the re-sale. Babu Deokinandan Rai and Sheobalak Rai claimed in the suit out of which this appeal arises to recover the amount paid by them upon the ground that the judgment-creditor recovered the money without any certificate furnished by the officer holding the sale, a preliminary which they contend was absolutely necessary before the amount could be recovered. Both the Courts below have held that the absence of the certificate mentioned in s. 293 of the Code of the Civil Procedure is a fatal defect. The order of the Court passed without this preliminary certificate is according to them illegal and without jurisdiction. They accordingly decreed the suit brought by the respondents.

In appeal before us the contention is that the suit of the respondent is barred by article 13 of schedule II of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and further that the appellant is not prejudiced by the neglect or omission, if any, of the officer holding the sale to certify to the Court the deficiency of price and the expenses attendant on the re-sale.

In our opinion the plea that the suit was barred by limitation entirely fails. It is true that the order passed by the Court under whose directions the sale was held is dated the 2nd of March 1889. But an appeal was lodged from that order, and the date of the final decision in the case by a Court competent to determine it finally was the 10th of March 1892. The respondents are entitled to have this period excluded in computing the period of limitation, and if it be so excluded, the present suit, which was instituted on the 9th of March [24] 1893, was within one year from the 10th of March 1892, and consequently within time.

In arguing the second plea the learned vakil who appeared for the appellants divided his arguments into two heads: the first being that a suit to set aside an order passed under s. 293 was not maintainable; and the second that the certificate mentioned in s. 293 was not so essential that its absence would prevent a judgment-creditor or a judgment-debtor, as the case might be, recovering from the defaulter. His argument was that the order in question had been passed by a competent Court; it was intended by the Legislature, who have made no provision for appeal, to be a final order. He drew our attention to s. 283, and contended that the absence of any similar section relating to orders passed under s. 293 was strong ground for the conclusion that the Legislature did not intend that a suit should be brought to set aside such orders. But there is a vast difference between orders passed under ss. 280, 281, or 282 and orders passed under s. 293. The former class of orders are judicial or quasi judicial orders. They are not to be passed except after an investigation made and opportunity given to the parties interested to adduce evidence. No such provision is made with regard to orders passed under s. 293. S. 293 contemplates that the officer holding the sale shall simply go through the arithmetical process of calculating accurately what deficiency of price has taken place and what the expenses attending the re-sale were. To no one interested is any opportunity given of being present at or of questioning the arithmetical process aforesaid. The officer draws up his certificate and upon that certificate the Court also proceeds, at the instance of the parties authorized to set it in motion, to recover the amount certified, just as if the certificate were a decree and the Court were the Court executing a decree. Any order passed by a Court under such circumstances is in effect an administrative and not a judicial order. We know of no precedent or authority standing in the way of such orders being questioned by a separate suit. There being no enactment in [25] bar, the suit was in our opinion one which the Court had jurisdiction to try, and the argument that the suit was not maintainable has no force.

As regards the question whether a certificate by the officer holding the sale is so essential a preliminary that without it a Civil Court cannot at the instance of the judgment-creditor or judgment-debtor, order a recovery from the defaulter, we were referred to no authority or precedent on the point. The learned counsel for the respondents took his stand upon the language used in s. 293. He pointed out to us that the provision requiring a certificate did not exist in Act No. VIII of 1859. Its insertion in the present Code must have been, so he argued, of set purpose. A careful consideration of s. 293 satisfies us that we should not be warranted in drawing the conclusion he asked us to draw from the language contained in it. Two things are provided for by that section. The first is that the deficiency of price and expenses attending the re-sale shall be entered in a certificate to be drawn up by the officer holding the sale. The second is that the deficiency in those expenses shall be recoverable from the defaulter in the manner set out. But each provision is independent of the other, and there is no word or expression compelling us to hold that the first is a condition precedent to the second. It is easy to see that if it were a condition precedent cases of very great hardship and injustice might ensue. The officer holding the re-sale might die before he had granted the certificate, or he might be prevented in other ways from making such a certificate. His incapacity to grant the certificate might be due to no fault of the judgment-creditor or the judgment-debtor. To debar these persons from recovering money to which they are entitled both in law and equity merely because of such an incapacity would amount to a miscarriage of justice. We prefer to put upon the section an interpretation which it can bear and which will not result in such hardships. The result, therefore, is that this appeal will prevail. The appeal will be decreed. The judgment and decree of the lower appellate Court will be set aside and the case [26] remanded to the lower appellate Court with instructions to re-admit it upon its original file of pending appeals and to dispose of it according to law. Costs will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

JUDGMENT.

executed by one Murlidhar, now deceased. The defendants are the grandsons of Murlidhar, being the sons of his deceased son Ajudhia Prasad.

There is no dispute in this appeal in regard to the mortgage bond dated the 1st of November 1881. It is the other bond with [27] which we are concerned. The amount claimed under that bond is Rs. 1,000, on account of principal, and Rs. 2,334-7-9 on account of interest, total Rs. 3,334-7-9.

The defendants urged that they were not liable under Hindu law to pay as interest any sum in excess of the principal amount secured by the bond, and they paid into Court Rs. 2,000, for payment to the plaintiff.

The lower Court found that the mortgaged property was the joint ancestral property of the family, that the debt had not been incurred for a family necessity, but was a personal debt of Murlidhar, and that it was not tainted with immorality. The Court held that the defendants were liable to pay the debt "by reason of their pious duty as Hindus;" that "their obligation to pay the debt arises out of a rule of Hindu law and is therefore limited by the restrictions imposed by that very same law," and that under Hindu law a grandson was "not bound to pay any interest at all." It accordingly made a decree for the principal amount only and dismissed the whole of the claim for interest, although the defendants had paid into Court Rs. 1,000 on account of interest.

The correctness of this judgment and decree has been assailed in this appeal on behalf of the plaintiff. The findings of fact of the Subordinate Judge have not been questioned, but it is urged that he has erred in dismissing the claim for interest on the authority of Hindu law and that he has misapplied the rules of that law on the subject.

The following authorities were referred to in the course of the argument:—Vrihaspati, Chapter XI (Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIII, pages 319 and 323); Narada (Ib. p. 42); Vishnu Smritis, Chapter VI (Ib. Vol. VII, p. 44); Colebrooke's Digest, Vol. I, Madras Edition, pp. 185, 207, 208 and 227; the Viramitrodaya (p. 154, Golab Chandra Sarkar's translation); the Vyavahara Mayukha (Mandlik's Edition, p. 112); the Vayavastha Chandrika, Vol. I, pp. 238 and 240; Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage, paragraph 282, p. 324, 5th Edition; Girdharee Lall v. [28] Kantoo Lall (1); Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (2); Narasimharav Krishnarav v. Antaji Virupaksh (3); Ponnappa Pillai v. Pappuvayyanganar (4); Muddun Gopal Lall v. Mussammatt Gowrunbutty (5); Bissessur Lall Sahoo v. Luchmessur Singh (6); Muttayan Chettiar v. Sangili Vira Pandia Chinnatambiar (7); and Lachmi Narain v. Kunji Lal (8).

The question we have to determine is whether the mortgagee from a Hindu of the joint ancestral property of the latter can enforce his mortgage against the grandson of the mortgagor for the realization of the interest secured by the mortgage, in addition to the principal amount of the mortgage, or whether the liability of the mortgaged property in the hands of the grandson extends only to the principal amount. The question is a novel one and is not covered by the authority of decided cases, except a case in the Bombay High Court to which we shall refer hereafter.

The obligation of a Hindu son or grandson to pay the debt of his ancestor, the debt not being of an immoral character, is founded on the following texts:—

(1) 1 I. A. 321=22 W.R. 56.

(4) 4 M. 1.

(7) 9 I.A. 128.

(2) 13 C. 21.

(5) 15 B.L.R. 264.

(8) 16 A. 449.

(3) 12 B.H.C.R. 61 at p. 64.

(6) 5 C.L.R. 477.

Narada says :—"The father being dead, it is incumbent on the sons to pay his debt each according to the share (of inheritance), in case they are divided in interests. Or if they are not divided in interests, the debt must be discharged by that son who becomes manager of the family estate.

"If a debt has been legitimately inherited by the sons, and left unpaid by them, such debt of the grandfather must be discharged by his grandsons. The liability for it does not include the fourth in descent." (Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIII, pp. 41 and 42.)

According to Vrihasnati, the father's debt must be paid first of all, and after that a man's own debt; but a debt contracted by the paternal grandfather must always be paid [29] before these two even," (Chapter XI, v. 48: Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIII, p. 323.)

The texts of Vishnu, Yajnavalkya and Katyayana are also to the same effect.

The reason for the above rule appears from the following text of Narada :—Fathers desire male offspring for their own sake, reflecting 'this son will redeem me from every debt whatsoever due to superior and inferior beings.' Therefore a son begotten by him should relinquish his own property, and assiduously redeem his father from debt, lest he fall into a region of torment." (Colebrooke's Digest, Vol. I, p. 202; Book I. CLXXXIX).

In the case of the grandson, the obligation to pay the debt of the grandfather is limited to the principal amount of the debt by the following text of Vrihaspati:—

"The father's debt, on being proved, must be paid by the sons as if it were their own; the grandfather's debt must be paid (by his son's sons) without interest." (Chapter XI, v. 49, Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIII, p. 328.) Katyayana also ordains that "a debt of the grandfather shall be paid by his grandsons without interest." (Colebrooke's Digest, Vol. I, p. 207. Book I, Chapter V. CXCVII.) The same rule was adopted by the Vyavahara Mayukha. (Mandlik's translation, p. 113.)

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that as the Hindu law which imposes on the grandson the obligation to pay the debts of his grandfather limits that obligation to the principal amount of the debt only, the courts in enforcing the obligation should not enforce it unfettered by the limitation.

It may be observed that the liability imposed by the texts of Hindu law referred to above on the son or grandson to pay the debt of his father or grandfather is a personal liability, irrespective of the existence of assets. The courts, however, except in the single case which arose in the Presidency of Bombay, have held that the liability is only proportionate to the extent of the assets which have come to the son or grandson. The courts were evidently of opinion that the texts of the sages on the point contain [30] rules of moral obligation only, directory and not imperative. Most of the rulings bearing on the point have been cited in the note to paragraph 280 of Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage (5th edition, p. 322). The solitary case in the Bombay Presidency to which we have referred is that of Narasimharav Krishnarav v. Antaji Virupaksh, decided on the 8th of March 1865 (1), in which according to the head note, it appears to have been held that "the grandson of a Hindu is bound to pay the debt of his grandfather, independent of assets, but without interest, according to the doctrine of the Maharashtra School." The judgment itself as reported does not contain any reasons for the above ruling, and, even if it can be regarded as an authority at all, it may be an authority in the province governed by the Maharashtra School and not in these provinces where the doctrines of the Benares School of the Mitakshara Law prevail. This decision, however, led to the enactment of the Bombay Act No. VII of 1866 by which the liability of the son or grandson of a deceased Hindu for the debts of the deceased was limited to the extent of the property of the deceased received or taken possession of by the son or grandson and not duly applied. We have not been referred to, nor are we aware of any other ruling in which it was held that a grandson was liable only for the principal amount of the debt of his grandfather. The texts of Vishnu and Yajnavalkya do not place any such limit on the extent of a grandson's liability, but treat the liability of the son and the grandson to discharge the debt of their ancestor as co-extensive. (See Colebrooke's Digest, Vol. I, Book I, Chap. V CLXVIII and CLXX.) It is true, that, according to the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council, the pious obligation of a Hindu son or grandson to pay the debt of his father or grandfather, not tainted with immorality, creates a legal liability but their Lordships have not limited the extent of the liability, in the case of the grandson, to the principal amount of the debt only, or, in the case of the son, to the principal and interest not exceeding the principal. In Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun [31] (1) their Lordships said—"The decisions have for some time established the principle that the sons cannot set up their right against their father's alienation for an antecedent debt or, the creditors' remedies for their debts, if not tainted with immorality." The words we have emphasized clearly show that in the opinion of their Lordships the creditors of the father are entitled to pursue their remedy against the joint ancestral estate for the realization of the amount of the debt due from the father under the contract entered into by him, that is, for the principal and the stipulated amount of interest, where interest has been agreed to be paid. Whatever the texts of the authorities on Hindu Law may be, we are bound to administer that law as interpreted and enforced by their Lordships of the Privy Council. In Hunooman Persaud Panday v. Musammatt Babooee Munraj Koonweree (2) in which the question of the son's liability arose, their Lordships held:—"The freedom of the son from the obligation to discharge the father's debt has respect to the nature of the debt and not the nature of the estate, whether ancestral or acquired by the creator of the debt." This rule has been followed in all subsequent cases beginning with the case of Girdharee Lal v. Kantoo Lal (3). In all these cases their Lordships confined their observations to the nature of the debt of the father and not to the amount of it, and held that if the debt was one which it was the pious duty of the son to pay, the creditor could pursue against the estate in the hands of the son the same remedy that he could have pursued against the father had he been alive. There can be no question that the creditor was entitled to recover from the father the principal amount of the debt as well as interest on that amount, at the contracted rate. He is equally entitled to recover the same from the son, and it is not competent to the son to say that he is not liable to pay a larger amount of interest than that enjoined by the texts of Hindu sages. The same principle applies to the case of the grandson, and it is not open to him to contend that his liability extends only to the principal amount of the debt.

[32] The particular question now before us was not, it is true, considered and determined by the Lords of the Privy Council; but the effect of their rulings is, in our opinion, to render the sons and grandsons of a Hindu debtor liable to the same extent as the debtor himself, provided they were possessed of sufficient family property or assets of the debtor not otherwise duly applied. Any other conclusion will, in our judgment, lead to numerous and serious complications in the framing of a decree for sale under s. 88 of Act No. IV of 1882 in the case of a mortgage of joint ancestral property made by a Hindu who has sons and grandsons and whose sons and grandsons have, under Section 85, been made parties to the suit for sale according to the ruling of the Full Bench in Badri Prasad v. Madan Lal (1).

In our judgment the Court below has erred in dismissing the claim for interest. We allow the appeal and vary the decree below by adding to the amount of that decree Rs. 2,334-7-9, as interest on the bond of the 25th of October 1881. The appellant will get his costs in the Court below and in this Court.

We extend the time for payment of the mortgage money to the 15th of January 1897.

The objection under Section 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not pressed and is dismissed with costs.

KNOX, J.—The facts of this case have been fully recapitulated in the judgment just delivered and therefore I do not intend to go over them again. I only wish to add a few observations upon the question referred looked at from the standpoint of the texts of Hindu Law.

The question which has to be determined is whether a Hindu grandson who is prepared to pay a debt incurred by his grandfather is also bound to pay the interest which may have accrued and would in ordinary circumstances be due and payable in addition to the principal debt. The decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Nanomi Babuasin v. Modhun Mohun (2) to the effect that sons in a Hindu joint family cannot set up their rights against [33] their father's alienation for an antecedent debt, or against his creditor's remedies for their debts, if not tainted with immorality, would appear to compel us to answer the question in the affirmative. But it was contended on behalf of the respondents that the case before their Lordships was not the case of grandsons being made responsible for the debts of a grandfather. It was pointed out that nowhere in that case or in the cases which were cited to their Lordships at the hearing of the case had any reference been made to the text of Hindu Law which deal with the liability of grandsons under such circumstances. All that the respondents maintained in the present appeal was that they were not, according to Hindu law, liable for interest, at any rate in excess of the principal debt. In support of the contention we were referred to several passages from Hindu text-books, the chief being one from Brihaspati, Chap. XI, Sloka 49. That sloka, as translated by Dr. J. Jolly in the Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXXIII, p. 328, runs as follows:—

"The father's debt on being proved must be paid by the sons as if it were their own, the grandfather's debt must be paid by his son's sons without interest, but the son of a grandson need not pay it at all."

We were also referred to the same passage in the Digest of Hindu Law by Jagannatha Tarkapanchanana as translated by H. T. Colebrooke (Madras Edition, 1864, p. 185). On the authority of these and other texts to the same effect rests the contention that a grandson who may have to pay a debt incurred by his grandfather is not liable for the interest on such debt. A closer examination, however, of the passage quoted from Brihaspati shows that the contention rests upon insufficient grounds. Brihaspati divides the chapter in which he deals with debt into three portions. The first portion (slokas 1—38) deals with money lent upon the security of pledges or deposits; the second (slokas 39—53) is devoted to money lent upon "trustworthy sureties." The remainder of the chapter is taken up with recovery of money lent. If the case before us falls under any portion of the chapter it would fall under [34] the first portion. The cardinal rule relating to the payment of interest upon money lent upon pledges or deposits is contained in Sloka 2nd which, subject to restrictions which follow, lays down that interest shall be taken by the creditor so long as the principal remains unpaid. The limit in these cases to interest would appear to be interest equal in amount to the principal. The sloka upon which the learned counsel for the respondents relies is one which deals with debts not so secured, and in the absence of any contrary expressions it must and should be held to have reference to that class of debts alone.

On this ground too the contention of the respondents fails and I would allow the appeal.

of the holding; that, wanting capital, he took Bhika, through whom these appellants claim, into a kind of partnership in the cultivation, and that, after they had cultivated under [35] this quasi partnership for two or three years, Bhika wrongfully ousted the plaintiff from possession. These appellants pleaded that they were the tenants of the zamindar of the holding. The lower appellate Court found that the plaintiff was the sole tenant, and practically found that the case of these appellants was false. It is to be noticed that the plaintiff alleged a dispossession by trespassers. There were other defendants in the case, and these appellants did not prove that they had held title through the zamindar and that it was at his instance that they dispossessed the plaintiff. The case was one for the Civil Court. Having regard to s. 99, cl. (j), and to s. 210 of Act No. XII of 1881, we think cl. [36] BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The defendants appellants by a sale-deed dated the 7th of September 1892, conveyed certain zamindari property to the plaintiffs and covenanted to put the plaintiffs into possession of their sir lands, which they also conveyed by the deed. They disclaimed any rights which might accrue to them as ex-proprietary tenants in respect of the sir lands, and recited in the sale-deed that they had relinquished their ex-proprietary rights from the date of the sale. The plaintiffs not having obtained possession of the zamindari rights and sir lands brought the present suit to recover possession of them. They claimed in the alternative that in the event of actual possession not being awarded over the sir lands, compensation should be made to them by the defendants proportionately to the amount of the consideration paid for the sir lands. The Court below has made a decree in their favour for possession of the zamindari and for Rs. 771 as compensation in respect of the sir lands. The defendants have appealed, and the only contention raised on their behalf is that as the agreement for the sale of the ex-proprietary rights was contrary to law it was void, and therefore the claim for a refund of the consideration money was not maintainable.

There can be no question that the sale-deed, so far as it purported to convey the ex-proprietary rights to the plaintiffs, was in violation of ss. 7 and 9 of Act No. XII of 1881 and was therefore an unlawful and void contract. The plaintiffs, having entered into a contract which was void at the time it was made, and was known to them to be so, cannot legally claim to be placed in the position in which they were before the contract was made, that is they cannot claim that the defendants vendors should refund to them a portion of the sale consideration proportionate to the value of the ex-proprietary rights. This question is concluded by the authority of two important judgments of this Court, viz., Second Appeal No. 300 of 1889,* decided on the 21st July, 1891, [37] and

STRAIGHT, J.—This was a suit brought by the plaintiffs-appellants to recover from the defendants the sum of Rs. 700 with interest thereupon. It is not denied that the sale transaction in respect of which the claim was preferred was in respect of the sale of a holding of which the defendants were ex-proprietary tenants under s. 7 of the Rent Act; that such sale was prohibited by law; that the plaintiffs paid the consideration money for the sale that they were put in possession, and that it was only by the action of the zamindar in bringing the suit that they were ousted from possession. The matter therefore stands thus: that the plaintiffs and the defendants entered into a contract of sale which in direct terms is prohibited by statute, that the terms of the statute were well known to both the parties, and they severally entered into an unlawful contract with their eyes open. Now it is not a case in which a party having entered into a contract prohibited by law before such contract has been fully executed repudiates it and demands to be restored to his original position, but it is a case of an entirely completed contract in which each party has done all that he could do, has obtained all the rights that he could obtain, in the enjoyment of which he could have remained, but for the interposition of a third party, who, in asserting the illegality of the contract, puts an end to their several positions. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are not entitled to come in and seek the assistance of a Court of Justice to obtain money which as their share of the illegal contract was paid by them to the defendants. It cannot be denied that both the plaintiffs and the defendants were in pari delicto in the matter of the contract and all that was done under it; and it is equally clear that the defendants are persons who are in possession of the money paid to them by the plaintiffs, and being in the position of defendants have the stronger position. Mr. Sunder Lal for the appellants has relied upon s. 65 of the Contract Act. In my opinion that section has no application to a case in which two parties with full knowledge of all the facts and the law, presuming that they are well acquainted with the statutory prohibition against what they are doing, enter into a contract which is prohibited by law and the contract is executed to the full extent that it could be executed. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the decree of the Lower Court can be sustained upon these grounds, and it therefore becomes unnecessary to discuss the question of limitation which has been raised. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

KNOX, J.—I fully concur in the above order, and I would further add that, whatever force there might have been in Mr. Sunder Lal's contention, it is quite obvious from the way in which the plaintiffs came into Court that they did not allege that the contract had been discovered to be void. They came into Court alleging that they were entitled to a refund and claimed a refund accordingly.

Second Appeal No. 676 of 1894 decided on the 13th of July 1896. The latter case was even stronger than the present, as in that case the vendors covenanted to return a portion of the purchase money in the event of their failing to deliver possession of [38] the sir lands conveyed by the sale-deed. Notwithstanding that covenant, it was held that the plaintiff could not recover, the covenant having been introduced into the sale-deed in order to defeat section 7 of Act No. XII of 1881. Mr. Satya Chandar on behalf of the respondents relies on Fasih-ud-din v. Karamat-ullah (1). That case in our opinion is distinguishable from the present. There the vendor sued to recover possession of the sir lands of which the vendee had already obtained possession. It was held that the vendor was not entitled to get back possession from the vendee, through the assistance of the Court, without tendering to the vendee that portion of the purchase money which was the price of the sir. That was a case in which the vendor sought by the aid of the Court to get possession of the sir land the sale of which was illegal, retaining at the same time in his own hands the benefit derived by him from the illegal agreement. In such a case the Court might equitably refuse to put back the vendor into the position in which he was before the sale, without placing the vendee in a similar position. Such is not, however, the case here. To allow a claim of this description would be to countenance an intentional violation of the law. There is no equity in favor of a person who with his eyes open enters into a contract, the object of which is to defeat the provisions of the law. The plaintiffs were in our judgment not entitled to the decree for Rs. 771 granted to them by the Court below. We allow the appeal to this extent that we reduce the amount decreed by Rs. 771. We affirm the decree below, except as regards the said sum of Rs. 771, and the costs of the suit. The parties will pay and receive costs in the Court below in proportion to the value of the claim now dismissed and decreed. We make no order as to the costs of this appeal.

[On appeal from the High Court at Allahabad.]

MATHURA DAS AND ANOTHER (Appellants) v. RAJA NARINDAR BAHADUR (Respondent).

[19th June, and 31st July, 1896.]

Mortgage—Post diem interest—Damages—Construction of document—Continuing breach of contracts—Limitation—Act XV of 1877, Art. 115 and 116.

No payment had been made on an agreement contained in a mortgage-deed for payment of the principal within a year, and interest thereon at a stated rate. The deed provided that the borrower would not transfer the mortgaged property until payment in full of the amount due for principal and interest and that any money paid should be first credited to the latter.

In a suit brought more than seven years after the date fixed for payment, the Courts below gave effect to the defence that the creditor had no right under the contract to interest at the rate specified therein for the period after that date; and that limitation barred recovery of money by way of damages for a breach of the contract.

Held, that the Courts below had erred as to the effect of the contract, and that there had been a failure to regard the intention shown by the conditions in the mortgage deed above mentioned, the High Court appearing to have acted on a fixed rule of construction laid down for transactions of this kind, instead of arriving at the meaning of the deed by an examination of its terms. By the true construction of the contract, when the whole of it was considered, the creditor was entitled to payment of the principal with interest at the rate stated in the deed for the entire period of non-payment. This should be down to the date of the decree of the first Court. In the decree should be added interest from its date till payment at six per cent. per annum.

Even supposing the construction put by the Courts below to have been correct, the creditor still might have recovered six years' arrears of interest by way of damages, notwithstanding limitation. There had been a breach of contract daily while the principal remained unpaid, and unbarred by time.

The judgment of the Full Bench in Narindra Bahadur Pal v. Khadim Husain (1) was not approved; as it disregarded conditions in the mortgage deed (which in that case resembled the present deed) indicating the intention of the parties to it.

APPEAL from a decree (27th April 1891) of the High Court affirming a decree (7th September 1888) of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur.

[40] The appellants were the successors in the firm of the plaintiffs who filed this suit upon a registered deed of mortgage executed on the 17th February 1880 by the late Raja Bhawani Ghulam Pal, who died after the decree of the High Court and whose representatives were brought on to the record for the purposes of this appeal on the 16th July 1892. The latter were now named as respondents; but Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal, the first of them, alone appeared as respondent to support the decree.

The material part of the deed, as well as the facts, appear in their Lordships' judgment.

The principal question raised by this appeal was whether the High Court had rightly construed the agreement in the mortgage-deed to repay the principal borrowed with interest at a specified rate within a year, with certain accompanying agreements; one against the transfer of the security by the mortgagor, and another relating to the appropriation of the payments to be made to the mortgagee. This governed the question whether the interest was to be paid at the specified rate during the whole time in which the debt and interest had remained unpaid. Secondly, it was disputed whether, supposing the contract to be only for a year's interest at the specified rate, compensating damages could be given for non-payment during the subsequent period, or were barred by limitation.

To secure the principal sum of Rs. 19,157, borrowed by him, the Raja mortgaged a mauza in zila Basti, by deed dated the 17th February 1880; and it was thereby agreed that he would repay the amount in full, principal and interest at Re. 1 as. 6 per mensem," within a year." The borrower agreed that he would not transfer the mortgaged property until payment of both the principal and interest should have been made; and the deed provided that the amounts paid should be first credited to the payment of interest, and that the balance, after that, should go to reduce the principal. Nothing had been paid for principal or interest on the 19th June 1889, when in this suit the representatives of the mortgagee claimed payment, with interest at the rate of Re. 1-6 per mensem, for [41] the whole period, from the 17th February 1880 to the date of suit brought, that interest amounting to Rs. 26,358. The defendant, who disputed the rate of the interest, denied that he was liable for the period after the expiration of a year from the date of the deed at the rate claimed. He also contended that, as the property was not charged as a security for the payment of the interest after the date when the principal had become due, the six years' bar of limitation applied to the claim for damages for breach of contract.

The Subordinate Judge decreed the principal and one year's interest only at the rate stated in the mortgage-deed. The latter he construed as not containing any express agreement to pay interest at the rate specified after the expiration of one year. He was of opinion that no such agreement could be implied, and he held that if the claim for the amount due for interest after the 17th February 1881, should be put forward as damages for the delay in payment of the principal and interest for one year, then the claim by way of such damages would be barred by time, the breach of contract having occurred more than six years before the date of the suit. Some alleged acknowledgments of liability by the defendant were not, in the Subordinate Judge's opinion, sufficient to satisfy section 19 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. His judgment was mainly founded on the law laid down in Mansab Ali v. Gulab Chand (1). The decree was for interest on the amount, which he decreed at the rate of Rs. 12 per annum, from the date of the decree.

On the plaintiffs' appeal the High Court (STRAIGHT and TYRRELL, JJ.) affirmed the decree of the first Court.

The material part of the judgment of the High Court was as follows:—

"The present suit was instituted on the 19th of June 1888, and by it the plaintiffs sought to recover from the mortgagor-defendant and the mortgaged property the sum of Rs. 19,157 principal with interest from the 17th February, 1880, to the date of the institution of the suit, at the rate mentioned in the bond, amounting to [42] Rs. 26,358-7, or in all Rs. 45,515-7. The defendant did not deny his liability under the bond as to the principal or the interest at the rate mentioned in the bond up to the date on which it became payable, but he objected to the claim of the plaintiff to the interest post diem on the ground that there was no covenant in the bond for the payment of such interest. The learned Subordinate Judge, from whose decree the appeal before us has been preferred, gave the plaintiff a decree for the principal amount due upon the bond, together with interest for one year amounting to Rs. 3,156, and he dismissed the rest of the claim.

"The plaintiffs have appealed, and their appeal is confined to two matters: first, the mode in which the learned Subordinate Judge has construed the bond; and second, to the question of post diem interest.

"In other words, two questions only are at issue before us in appeal, namely, whether the terms of the mortgage-bond, dated the 17th February, 1880, provided for the payment of interest, after the expiry of one year from the due date of the bond, and whether, regarding the post diem interest as damages, the bar of the limitation of article 116 of Act No. XV of 1877 is saved by any acknowledgment or acknowledgments of the kind mentioned in s. 19 of such last mentioned Act.

"As to the first of these two points there does not appear to me any room for doubt as to the language of the instrument of mortgage which is clear. It is as follows:—'I shall pay off without any objection the said amount in full, principal and interest, and at the rate of Re. 1-6 per cent. per mensem, within a year.....If I fail to pay off the amount within the fixed term, the said bankers shall be competent to realise the amount,' &c.

"There is no distinction I can see to be drawn between the present case and that of Sri Niwas Ram Pande v. Udit Narain Misr (1), and as the considered judgment in the case was delivered after we had heard L'andit Bishambar Nath for the plaintiffs-appellants upon the first question in this case, the reasoning we applied in that judgment is applicable to this appeal, and it is not necessary to repeat here the remarks we then made. I am satisfied that, upon the language of the instrument dated the 17th February 1880, there was no covenant for the payment of post diem interest, and that the only footing upon which the plaintiffs can be recouped for the loss they have sustained by the non-payment of the mortgage money upon the due date, is by way of damages, the limitation to a suit for which is provided by Article 116 of the first schedule of the Limitation Act. That being so, we have now to consider whether that limitation stands in the way of their getting any damages. The due date of the mortgage-bond sued upon was the 17th February 1881, and the suit was brought on the 19th June, 1888, which would be seven years and some three or four months after the date when the amount of the instrument of mortgage became payable."

The judgment then considered documentary evidence that had been given of an alleged acknowledgment by the defendant of his liability to pay interest upon the bond debt after the due date of the bond and arrived at the conclusion that there was nothing to be found that could be taken to constitute any such acknowledgment within s. 19 of the Indian Limitation Act. The judgment added:—"It is not without regret that I have placed this construction on these documents. The defendant had the use of the plaintiff's money for a considerable period of time, and the rate of the interest in the bond was not an unreasonable one, which, but for the difficulty of limitation, I should not have hesitated to treat as a fair basis for estimating damages."

On this appeal—

Mr. H. A. Giffard, Q. C., and Mr. Herbert Cowell, for the appellant, submitted that there was error in the judgment of the High Court; and that, according to the true construction of the agreement to pay interest, the rate was to be Re. 1 as. 6 a month after, as well as before, the due date. That the rate prescribed by the deed should continue until the payment of the principal should be made was the intention at the time when the contract was [44] made, as evidenced by the terms of the deed. It was not in the contract that the creditor should enforce payment of the debt at due date, or else submit to being paid interest at a reduced rate. On the contrary, it was clear, when the whole deed was read, that although it was to be open to the debtor to redeem within the year, the specified rate of interest was to continue until payment of the principal and interest should be made. This view was supported by the agreements accompanying the mortgage, viz., that the debtor was not to transfer the mortgaged property till payment had been made of the principal and interest; and that the amounts paid by the debtor should be first credited to payment of the interest, and then that the balance should be credited to payment of the principal. This hardly applied to a payment within the year.

In the next place it was argued that, even if the High Court had been right in its construction, and even if the contract was restricted to the year, for the interest specified, at all events, the creditor would be entitled to interest at a reasonable rate, whether called by that name or not, and whether given by the court under the authority of the Interest Act XXXII of 1839, or awarded by the court as damages, compensating for the breach of contract. Viewing the sum to be awarded as damages, and having regard to the law of limitation, the court could have given six years' interest out of the seven years' and three months' interest claimed, on the assumption that articles 115 and 116 of Act XV of 1877 were applicable. Compensation would be recoverable because the cause of action, in respect of the breach of contract to pay the principal and interest, was a continuing cause of action during non-payment. The High Court had itself pronounced the rate specified in the deed to be a reasonable one. Act XXXII of 1839 was cited, also Act XVIII of 1855, s. 2. A mortgage-deed, similar to that in the present suit had been held by the Calcutta High Court in Bikramjit Tewari v. Durga Dyal Tewari (1) to be within the meaning, so far as the promise to repay was concerned of the Interest Act above mentioned, which empowered the court to give [45] interest on money payable, within a certain term, under a written instrument. In Narindra Bahadur Pal v. Khadim Husain (2) the High Court at Allahabad had treated the agreement against any transfer by the mortgagor until payment, as one from which no inference could be drawn in regard to whether the interest after due date should be at the same rate as it had been before that date; and had dealt in the same way with the agreement that money paid by the mortgagor should be first credited to payment of the interest. It was argued that this was wrong. Reference was also made to Sri Niwas Ram Pande v. Udit Narain Misr (3). This was also erroneously decided on the construction of the contract as to interest. Reference was also made to Bhagwant Singh v. Daryao Singh (4) and the decision of the Judicial Committee in Chajmal Das v. Brijbhukan Lal (5).

Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the respondent, Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal, referred to the terms of the mortgage-deed contending that by none of those terms was the interest made a charge upon the property mortgaged for more than one year. The interest for the first year was charged upon the land. This went to support the correctness of the opinion that a difference in the rates of interest before and after the due date was not contrary to the terms employed in the deed. The clear restriction to "within the year" had been rightly regarded in the judgment of the Court below. He referred to Narindra Bahadur Pal v. Khadim Husain (1) and the cases cited in the judgment in that case, especially to Cook v. Fowler (2), cited also in Lala Chajmal Das v. Brijbhukhan Lal (3); and he referred to the expressions of the judgments in the House of Lords regarding their being no implied contract to pay interest after, at the same rate as before, written promises to pay on a certain date. It was also contended that the breach of contract took place on the failure to pay on the due date, a failure once and for all. In this view of the case the [46] High Court had held the claim for damages to be barred. Reference was made to articles 115, 116 and 132, of the Limitation Act XV of 1877.

Counsel for the appellant was not called upon to reply.

Afterwards, on the 31st July, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR R. COUCH:

JUDGMENT.

By a deed dated 17th February 1880, Raja Bhawani Ghulam Pal, the defendant, now represented by the respondents (the first of whom alone defends this appeal), mortgaged and hypothecated a certain mauza to Chbedi Lal, the predecessor in title of the plaintiffs who are now appellants, to secure the principal sum of Rs. 19,157. The deed then proceeded thus: "And I covenant and record that I shall pay off without any objection the amount in full, principal and interest at the rate of Re. 1-6-0 per cent. per mensem within a year, without raising any objection whatever. If I fail to pay off the amount within the fixed term, the said bankers shall be competent to realize the amount by any means possible, from my person and the properties mortgaged, and from other properties belonging to me, and I or my heirs neither have nor shall we have any objection whatever to it. Until the payment in full of this amount, principal and interest, I shall not transfer either directly or indirectly, the mortgaged property to anyone else, and if I do, such a transfer should be deemed to be false and inadmissible. The amounts paid by me should be first credited to the payment of interest, and the balance should be credited to that of the principal, and I shall have them entered on the back of the document."

No payment having been made, the plaintiff instituted this suit on 19th June 1888, for the usual mortgage decree. The Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur passed a decree in the usual form for the sum of Rs. 22,313, being the principal of the loan with one year's interest, and a further sum for costs. The rest of the claim he dismissed. He held on the authority of a decision of the High Court in a similar case that the mortgage-deed does not provide for interest after the first year. Being then pressed to [47] give damages by way of interest, he held that such a claim being compensation for breach of a contract was barred by articles 115 and 116 of the Limitation Act.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court who affirmed the decision of the Subordinate Judge on both points, and so dismissed the appeal, though without costs. From that decree the present appeal is brought. Supposing the construction put by the Courts below on the deed to be correct, the appellants still ask why they should not recover six years' arrears of interest by way of damages. It is very difficult to see why.

(1) 17 A 581.

(2) L.R. 7 E. and I. A. 27.

(3) 22 I. A. 199=17A. 511.

The principal debt was not time-barred, and it was not paid. Every day that it remained unpaid there was a breach of contract, and the bar of time applies only to breaches occurring six years before suit.

But it is not necessary to dwell further on this point, because their Lordships think that the Courts below have misconstrued the deed. Indeed they do not find in the judgments any attempt to arrive at the meaning of the deed by an examination of its terms. Both Courts appear to have followed decisions in other cases, according to which it would seem that in the High Court of Allahabad a fixed rule of construction has been laid down for transactions of this kind, without much regard to what the parties have actually said.

The latest case of the kind was decided as late as June 1895, Narindra Bahadur Pal v. Khadim Husain and others (1) after the decision of the case now under appeal; but it proceeded on the same judicial lines, and as it was referred to a Full Bench because of a discrepancy between the Allahabad and the Calcutta High Courts, it may be taken as the most authoritative statement of the views of the Allahabad Court.

The instrument to be construed resembled very closely that on which this Board is now engaged. The mortgagor covenanted to pay the principal loan with interest within one year. He then hypothecated land to secure "the said sum of money", and covenanted not to transfer the land "until I pay in full the whole of [48] the amount of principal and interest." "If I fail to pay the money with interest, the mortgagee was to recover the said sum of money with interest" from the property. And there was a provision that payments by the mortgagor should be credited, first to interest and afterwards to principal.

Upon that instrument the Court delivered the following judgment:—
"In our opinion the construction of the mortgage-deed admits of no doubt. The term was one year from the 28th of April 1879. The mortgagees could on the expiration of that year sue for and recover the principal moneys remaining due at the expiration of that year; in certain events the mortgagees could before the expiration of that year sue for and recover the principal and interest due at the date of their suit. On the other hand, the mortgagor could, by payment to the mortgagees or into the treasury of the Court of the principal and interest due, redeem the mortgage even before the expiration of the year. The payment of post diem interest was not provided for by the mortgage-deed, and certainly, according to the ordinary construction of such deeds in these provinces, which we believe to be correct, was not contemplated by the mortgagor. The conditions in the mortgage-deed binding the mortgagor not to transfer the mortgaged property, and giving the mortgagee power to recover the principal money with interest if the mortgagor failed to pay the principal with interest on the due date, are ordinary conditions commonly inserted in mortgage-deeds in these provinces, whether it is intended that interest shall run only to the due date or shall run not only to the due date but after due date and until the principal sum shall have been paid. Such conditions are never construed in this Court as indicating that interest shall continue to run after the due date."

Now there is not, as the learned Judges seem to imply, any different mode of construing language in the North-West Provinces from that which prevails elsewhere. Conditions in mortgage deeds must not be disregarded because they happen [49] to be common ones. If it be true that covenants not to transfer till principal and interest be paid are sometimes inserted, when the intention is only to secure interest for a single year, such intention must be gathered from other parts of the deed itself. If such a covenant, not being controlled by other parts of the deed, does not mean that interest is to run till payment, it is very difficult to say what it does mean. The covenant to pay within a year ties up the hands of the mortgagee for that year and protects the mortgagor: but it rarely happens, and is rarely contemplated, that the mortgagor should actually pay by that time. The provision for applying payments to reduction of interests points strongly to the expectation of the parties that the transaction will not be closed when the fixed day of payment arrives. The construction of the High Court ascribes to the parties an intention that, however payment may be delayed beyond the fixed day, the debt shall carry no interest, that the creditor shall have no remedy provided by contract, but shall be driven to treat the contract as broken, and to seek for damages, which lie in the discretion of a jury or a Court, and are subject to a different law of prescription. It appears to their Lordships that though contracts are not unfrequently bound to be of that imperfect nature, it is more reasonable to ascribe to the parties the intention of making a perfect contract, especially when such a contract is of a very common kind, and suitable to the ordinary expectations of persons entering into a mortgage transaction.

To their Lordships's understanding the meaning of the contract before them is plain enough. The mortgagee cannot, except in certain events, enforce payment for a year. The mortgagor may pay at any time, and is bound to pay in a year's time, "the said amount" (i.e., Rs. 19,157 the only amount yet mentioned) "principal and interest," i.e., whatever interest may be due at the time of payment, whether for a year or a less time. If he fails, the mortgagee may proceed to realize "the amount," the obvious meaning of which is, principal and interest to the time of realization. Then comes the covenant not to transfer until payment "of this [50] amount" (i.e., the amount to be realized "principal and interest") and then the proviso that payments shall be applied first in reduction of interest, and entered on the back of the document. The strictest construction of the words is in accordance with the usual intentions of the parties to a simple mortgage. Why they should be wrested from that construction in favour of an unusual and most improbable intention is not explained.

Their Lordships hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover their principal debt with interest at the rate mentioned in the mortgage-deed, up to the date of the Subordinate Judge's decree, and thereafter at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. The decree of the High Court should be discharged.

The respondents ought to pay the whole costs of suit in both the Courts below. The case should be remitted to the Subordinate Judge to take the proper accounts, and give further directions.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to this effect.

The respondents must pay the costs of this appeal.

Criminal Procedure Code, Sections 488, 489, 490 — Maintenance — Plea of divorce in answer to an application for enforcement of an order for maintenance of a wife.

Where in answer to an application for enforcement of an order under section 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the maintenance of a wife, the party against whom such order is subsisting pleads that he has lawfully [51] divorced his wife and therefore the order can no longer be enforced, it is the duty of the Court hearing the application to entertain and consider such plea, and, if it find the plea established, to decline to enforce the order for any period subsequent to the date when the marriage ceased to subsist between the parties.

In such case, where the parties are Muhammadans, the marriage will be deemed to subsist until the expiration of the iddat.

In section 489 of the Code the "change in circumstances" referred to is a change in the pecuniary or other circumstances of the party paying or receiving the allowance which would justify an increase or decrease of the amount of the monthly payment originally fixed, and not a change in the status of the parties which would entail a stoppage of the allowance.

So held by Aikman and Blennerhassett, JJ., dissentiente Knox, J.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, J.—Musammatt Ulfat Bibi presented an application before a Deputy Magistrate of the first class at Basti, praying for an order of maintenance to be granted in her favour under s. 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

Shah Abu Ilyas, the husband, appeared to answer this application and objected that Musammatt Ulfat Bibi was no longer his wife, as he had divorced her on the 11th of September 1895. There is nothing to show whether the divorce which he sets up was a revocable or irrevocable divorce. If it was the latter, the relationship of wife was no longer in existence in October 1895, the time at which these proceedings took place.

The learned Deputy Magistrate considered the objection raised by Shah Abu Ilyas, considered the fact of divorce proved, but held [52] that

CRIMINAL. On the 9th of December Shah Abu Ilyas, instead of getting the order revised, went to a Magistrate and objected that, as the period of iddat 19 A. 50= would expire on the 11th of December, he should not be liable for main-16 A.W.N. tenance after that date. He made the application under section 489. It (1896) 173. was refused, and in my opinion rightly refused, as section 489 has no application to such a case.

On the 6th of January 1896, Ulfat Bibi applied for enforcement of the order of maintenance. Her application was under s. 490. The Magistrate before whom it was laid satisfied himself as to the identity of the parties and the non-payment of the allowance due, and granted the application.

It is contended that he should have, in a proceeding instituted under s. 490 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, inquired into the fact whether Musammat Ulfat Bibi was still the wife of Shah Abu Ilyas. I have already considered this contention in Mahbuban v. Fakir Bakhsh (1) and I see no reason to alter the view I then formed. The law appears to me in s. 490 to be laid down in clear and definite terms, and I should be in my opinion framing new law if I were to add to s. 490 the words—"On the Magistrate being satisfied that the applicant is no longer the wife of the person against whom the order was originally made." If the person against whom the order was made wishes to contest the order, he should in my opinion do so when the order is passed, and not wait until it is about to be enforced. Otherwise we might have the unseemly case of a wife obtaining an order of maintenance from the Magistrate of the District one day, taking it the next day for enforcement to a Subordinate Magistrate, who could apparently then hold that she was not a wife and refuse to enforce it. It may [53] be that the law is defective, or it may be that the Legislature intended such cases to be dealt with by superior Courts in revision. I incline to the latter view. In any case, I hold that the words of s. 490 are clear, precise and imperative, and that the Legislature did not intend the Magistrate to whom an order like the present, unconditional and undetermined, was taken to consider any point other than the identity of the parties and the non-payment of the allowance due. I do not think it necessary to refer further to the rulings cited. They have been virtually considered by me in Mahbuban v. Fakir Bakhsh. I would decline to interfere and would reject the application.

AIKMAN, J.—This is an application for revision presented by one Shah Abu Ilyas under the following circumstances:—

The applicant was married to Musammat Ulfat Bibi.

Ulfat Bibi, on the 19th of September 1895, applied to a Magistrate of the first class for an order under s. 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure directing her husband to make her a monthly allowance for her maintenance.

When Shah Abu Ilyas was called on to show cause why such an order should not be passed, he alleged that Musammat Ulfat Bibi was no longer his wife, as he had divorced her on the 11th of September 1895.

(1) 15 A. 143.

When such a plea is put forward in answer to an application for an order for maintenance under s. 488, the Magistrate dealing with the application is not only competent, but it is his imperative duty, to inquire into the plea, and determine on such evidence as may be adduced before him whether the plea is a valid one; that is, whether the relation of husband and wife subsists between the person against whom an order is asked for and the person making the application, for, unless such conjugal relation subsists, a Magistrate has no authority to pass an order for maintenance as between husband and wife. In this case the Deputy Magistrate recorded evidence as to the alleged divorce, but he did not determine upon that evidence whether Shah Abu Ilyas had divorced his wife as he alleged. He contented himself with saying [54] that, even if a divorce had taken place, the husband was liable to support his wife during the period of iddat, which period had not expired on the 15th October 1895, when the case was disposed of. He directed Shah Abu Ilyas to pay Rs. 15 per mensem for the support of Musammat Ulfat Bibi, but in his order he fixed no period during which this monthly allowance was to continue.

The next stage of the case was that on the 9th of December 1895, Shah Abu Ilyas deposited in Court Rs. 15, being the monthly allowance from the date of the order up to the 15th of November 1895, along with a petition expressing his willingness to pay the allowance up to the 11th of December 1895, on which date, he contended, the period of iddat expired, but objecting to pay it after that date.

On the 6th of January 1896, Musammat Ulfat Bibi presented a petition in Court asking for the enforcement of the maintenance order, and stating that, although three months had elapsed, she had only received one month's allowance. (This statement was not quite accurate, as three months did not expire until the 15th of January 1896.) Mr. Munna Lal, the Deputy Magistrate who had passed the order for maintenance, having gone on leave, both these petitions came on for disposal before Mr. D. L. Johnston, Joint Magistrate. Before him Musammat Ulfat Bibi asserted her right to a monthly allowance irrespective of the period of iddat.

Shah Abu Ilyas, on the other hand, relying on his allegation of divorce, and on the decision of Mahmood, J. in In the matter of the petition of Din Muhammad (1), contended that the order of maintenance had become functus officio and incapable of enforcement.

After considering the ruling referred to above, and the ruling of my brother Knox in Mahbuban v. Fakir Bakhsh (2), the Joint Magistrate suggested to Shah Abu Ilyas that he should put in an application under s. 489 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Shah Abu Ilyas adopted this suggestion, and on the 25th of January 1896 put in an application purporting to be under [55] s. 489, and asking that the allowance should be stopped. The case was disposed of by the Joint Magistrate by an order dated the 28th of January 1896. In that order he came to the conclusion that s. 489 would not cover the present case. That section runs as follows:—"On proof of a change in the circumstances of any person receiving under s. 488 a monthly allowance or ordered under the same section to pay a monthly allowance to his wife or child, the Magistrate may make such alteration in the allowance as he thinks fit, provided the monthly rate of fifty rupees be not exceeded."

In the case Nepoor Aurat v. Jurai (3) the Calcutta High Court (Phear and Glover, JJ.) expressed an opinion that the corresponding section (537) of Act No. X of 1872, which does not differ materially from s. 489 of the present Code, would probably apply to a case like the present. Phear, J., observes:—"S. 537 provides a mode in which the person, against whom the order is made, can, upon a change of circumstances, get that order altered. And it seems to me probable that, upon the facts stated by the Deputy Magistrate, when the husband in his presence divorced his wife, such an alteration in circumstances did occur which would justify the Deputy Magistrate upon the application of the husband in altering the order of maintenance in favor of the wife."

Notwithstanding this opinion of the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court, it appears to me that the view taken by the Joint Magistrate is correct. I entertain no doubt that the "change in circumstances" referred to in s. 489 is a change in the pecuniary or other circumstances of the party paying or receiving the allowance which would justify an increase or decrease of the amount of the monthly payment originally fixed, and not a change in the status of the parties which would entail the stoppage of the allowance. I concur with the following observations of Mahmood, J., in the case of Din Muhammad (1):—"The words 'The Magistrate may make such alteration in the allowance ordered as he deems fit,' preceded as they are by the word 'wife,' and followed [56] as they are by a limitation as to the amount of the monthly allowance, clearly indicate that 'the alteration in the allowance' contemplated by that section only refers to a power to alter that amount and not to a total discontinuance thereof." The same view was taken in Abdur Rokoman v. Sakhina (2).

In disposing of the petitions before him, the Joint Magistrate rightly held that a plea of divorce, if made out, would not justify him in cancelling the order of maintenance under the penultimate paragraph of s. 488. The paragraph sets forth three grounds upon proof of which a Magistrate is authorized to cancel an order of maintenance passed in favour of a wife, and divorce is not one of these.

In considering whether he could give effect to the plea of Shah Abu Ilyas, the Joint Magistrate referred to two rulings of this Court, viz., the ruling of Mahmood, J., In the matter of the petition of Din Muhammad (1) and the ruling of my brother Knox in Mahbuban v. Fakir Bakhsh (3), in which he dissented from a previous decision of this Court by Oldfield, J., viz., Zeb-un-nissa v. Mendu Khan (4). It is with regard to these discordant rulings that the present case has been referred to this bench.

I find myself unable to agree with the view taken by my brother Knox. That view appears to me to be opposed not only to decisions of this Court, but to decisions of the Calcutta, Bombay and Madras High Courts and the Chief Court of the Punjab, and, so far as I can ascertain, it has not been adopted by any authority save my brother Knox. It has been repeatedly held that the Legislature in enacting s. 488 of the Code of Criminal Procedure did not intend to interfere with the right of divorce.

It cannot in my opinion be disputed that it is only on proof of the existence of conjugal relations between a man and a woman that the man can under s. 488 be ordered to provide for the woman's support and I hold that it is only on the supposition of the continued existence of that relationship that the allowance can [57] continue. Dealing with the corresponding section of the Presidency Magistrates' Act (No. IV of 1877),

(1) 5 A. 226.

(2) 5 C. 558.

(3) 15 A. 143.

(4) 5 A.W.N. (1885) 29.

Ainslie and McDonell, JJ. observed:—"In our opinion it is, under the terms of s. 234, as essential to the continued operation as to the original making of an order of maintenance that the recipient of the allowance should be a wife at the time for which maintenance is claimed, and consequently, for the purposes of Chapter XVIII of the Presidency Magistrates' Act of 1877, a Magistrate must, when a question of divorce arises, determine on such evidence as may be before him whether there has or has not been a legally valid divorce. If he finds that there has been a valid dissolution of the marriage tie, he should refrain from taking any steps to enforce the order of maintenance from the date of dissolution. Abdur Rohoman v. Sakhina (1).

In the case In re Kasam Pirbhai and his wife Hirbai (2) it was held by Westropp, C. J., and Bailey, J. that a husband against whom a maintenance order had been passed and who had subsequently divorced his wife was no longer liable under the maintenance order. The learned Judges observe in regard to the maintenance order:—"That was a proper order at the time it was made, but we think the ground work of that order has now been removed, and we cannot consider it any longer a continuing binding order upon the applicant. On the question that is before us, we say that we do not think that the Magistrate ought to issue an attachment upon, or otherwise to execute the order, it being in fact functus officio." That case was followed by Sarjent, C. J., and Melvill, J., in In re Abdul Ali Ishmailji and his wife Husenbi (3), where it was held that after a divorce a Magistrate should no longer enforce an order for maintenance.

In the case Mahomed Abid Ali Kumar Kadar v. Ludden Sahiba (4) the learned Judges (Prinsep and Beverley JJ.) held that a man who had been ordered by a Magistrate to pay maintenance to a woman on the ground that she was his wife, and who [58] had succeeded in procuring from a Court of competent jurisdiction a declaration that no relationship existed between him and the woman, might ask the Magistrate on the authority of Abdur Rohoman v. Sakhina (1) and Abdul Ali Ishmailji v. Husenbi (3) to abstain from giving any further effect to his order for maintenance.

It appears from a note in Prinsep's Code of Criminal Procedure, 11th edition, p. 318, that the Madras High Court has held that a Muhammadan wife divorced after an order for maintenance had been passed in her favour is entitled to maintenance during her iddat, but that the order cannot be enforced for a time subsequent to the expiry of the iddat.

In the case Musammat Baji v. Nawab Khan (5) the Chief Court of the Punjab, after considering the ruling of my brother Knox and other rulings referred to above, held that it is open to a Magistrate to entertain and inquire into a plea of divorce, and, if he finds it established, to refuse to enforce his order, at least after such date as the divorce operates under the law and custom governing the parties to disentitle the woman to further maintenance.

My brother Knox in the case Mahbubhan v. Fakir Bakhsh (6) held that "when a person in whose favour an order of maintenance has been given takes it before a Magistrate and the Magistrate finds that he has jurisdiction owing to the residence of the person affected by the order, and is satisfied as to the identity of the parties and the non-payment of the allowance due, it is his duty to enforce the order for maintenance."

Acting upon this decision the Joint Magistrate in this case directed that the order for maintenance should be enforced, and the Sessions Judge, before whom the case was taken in revision, declined to interfere with the order. I regret that I cannot concur with the decision of my brother Knox, which, as shown above, is opposed to the decisions of all the other Judges who have had to consider the point.

16 A.W.N.
(1896) 173.

[59] It appears to me to be a mistake to say that the only questions which a Magistrate before whom an order for maintenance is produced under s. 490 has to consider are whether he has jurisdiction over the person affected by the order, and whether he is satisfied as to the identity of the parties.

A most material question which in my opinion it is incumbent on him to consider is whether the order to which it is sought to give effect is still in force, or whether, to use the expression of Westropp, C.J., it has become "functus officio."

Take the case of a man who under s. 488 had been ordered to pay a monthly sum for the support of his illegitimate child until it should attain the age of twelve years. If such an order were produced before a Magistrate under s. 490, I do not think it could seriously be contended that all the Magistrate has to do is to satisfy himself that he has jurisdiction, that the parties are the same, and that the allowance is unpaid. He has further to consider the question of the age of the child, so as to ascertain whether the allowance claimed is or is not due under the order. So in the case of a woman producing under s. 490 an order for her maintenance, the Magistrate has to satisfy himself whether the allowance asked for is or is not due under the order. The order can only have been passed for an allowance to the woman as a wife, and, if she no longer occupies that position, the allowance is no longer due under the order, save for the period before she ceased to be the wife of the person ordered to pay the allowance.

This period, I hold, includes in the case of Muhammadans the period of the iddat. It is true that Oldfield, J., in the case from which my brother Knox dissented, held that no allowance was payable after the actual date of divorce, but he gives no reasons for his opinion, which is opposed to the judgment of Mahmood, J., in the case of Din Muhammad(1) and of the Madras High Court in the case referred to above. The passage quoted from the Hedaya by Mahmood, J. ("A marriage is accounted still to subsist during the iddat with respect to various of its effects, such as the obligation [60] of alimony, residence and so forth") is sufficient authority for the continuance of the allowance during the iddat.

For the above reasons I would set aside the order of the Joint Magistrate, and direct him to come to a finding on such evidence as may be adduced before him, as to whether Shah Abu Ilyas divorced his wife, and if so, on what date. If he finds that Shah Abu Ilyas did divorce his wife, he should determine what is the period of the iddat and enforce the maintenance order for that period and to no later date.

BLENNERHASSETT, J.—The authorities collected by my brother Aikman show a strong consensus of opinion among the High Courts of Calcutta, Bombay, Madras, and the North-Western Provinces, and the Chief Court of the Punjab in support of the view expressed by him.

(1) 5 A. 226.

Following those authorities, I concur in the judgment of my brother Aikman and in the order proposed by him.

BY THE COURT.

The order of the Court will be that the order of the Joint Magistrate be set aside, and the Joint Magistrate inquire into and determine whether Shah Abu Ilyas has divorced his wife, and if he has, that he should determine what is the period of the iddat and enforce the maintenance order until the expiry of that period and to no later date.

A prayer in a plaint purporting to be a plaint under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that the plaintiffs themselves may be appointed trustees is not a prayer for possession requiring to be stamped at the value of the trust property, but is a prayer for a relief falling within art. 17, cl. vi. of the second schedule to Act VII of 1870. *Sonachala v. JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This is an appeal from an order of the District Judge of Saharanpur rejecting a plaint on the ground that the reliefs sought in the plaint had not been properly valued and the necessary amount of court-fees had not been paid within the time allowed by the Court. One of the plaintiffs-appellants, Thakuri, is dead. We consider that the cause of action survives to the other appellants, and that the appeal may proceed at the instance of those appellants.

The suit was brought under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure by three Hindus who alleged that a trust had been created for certain charitable and religious purposes by Rani Mahtab Kunwar; that the trustee appointed by her had committed a breach of the trust by alienating a portion of the endowed property and that the heirs of the trustee had made a gift of the trust property in favour of the person through whom the defendants now claim. The plaintiffs prayed that it might be declared that the property was endowed property. They further prayed that they should be appointed superintendents of the property and that an injunction should be issued to the defendant forbidding him to interfere with the discharge of the plaintiffs' duties as superintendents.

They also asked the Court to grant such other reliefs as to the Court might seem proper having regard to the provisions of s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The learned Judge was of opinion that the suit was substantially one for possession. He ordered the plaintiffs to value the suit as a suit for possession and to pay the amount of court-fees [62] requisite for such a suit within a time fixed by him. The plaintiffs not having complied with this order he has rejected the plaint.

The learned Judge has relied in support of his view on the ruling of the Madras High Court in Sonachala v. Manika (1). That case is distinguishable from the present. It was not a suit under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure. If the principle laid down in that case were to be applied to a suit under s. 539, and every suit under that section in which the appointment of trustees was prayed for, or the removal of a trustee was sought, had to be treated as a suit for possession of the property, the salutary provisions of that section would be seriously interfered with and in many cases defeated. A suit under that section is brought for the protection and preservation of endowed property, and it is safe-guarded by the rule which requires that it must be brought by the Advocate-General himself, or with the consent of the Advocate-General or such other officer as the Local Government may appoint in this behalf. Instances may often arise in which the trust property is of considerable value. If court-fees had to be paid with reference to that value whenever it was found necessary to bring a suit to remove a trustee who had committed a breach of his trust, such court-fees might be prohibitive and might prevent the institution of the suit. In this case the learned Judge below treats the suit as "obviously a suit for possession." We are unable to agree with his view of the nature of the prayer in the plaint. The plaintiffs nowhere seek possession of the property. Although they ask that they may be appointed superintendents, they might never be appointed to that office. The Judge might see fit to appoint some other person as trustee or superintendent, and no occasion might arise for the plaintiffs taking possession of the property. It might also not be necessary to eject the defendant. If the declaration sought for be made, the defendants might themselves cease to interfere with the property. In our opinion therefore the learned Judge below was not right in holding that this was necessarily a suit for possession.

[63] The learned counsel for the respondents cited to us the case of Delroos Banoo Begum v. Ashgur Ally Khan (2). That was no doubt a suit similar to the one before us in so far that the plaintiffs in that suit asked to be appointed mutawallis; but in that case there were emoluments attached to the office of mutawalli, and by reason of those emoluments being capable of valuation it was held that the suit was not one in which the subject-matter could not be valued. In Omrao Mirza v. Jones (3) it was held that the right to retain control over trust property could not be estimated at a money value and that a suit for that purpose would ordinarily fall within art. 17, cl. vi, of the second schedule to the Court-Fees Act. In that particular case, however, the plaintiff had chosen to put a valuation on the subject-matter of his suit, and the Court held that as that valuation afforded a basis for the assessment of court-fees, the fees should be paid with reference to it. The two rulings therefore in our opinion do not support the contention of the learned counsel for the respondents.

(1) 8 M. 516.

(2) 15 B. L. R. 167.

(3) 10 C. 599.

In our judgment the suit as framed embraced a claim for a declaratory decree to the effect that the property in suit was endowed property. For that portion of the claim the amount of Court-fee was Rs. 10. It also embraced a prayer for the appointment of the plaintiffs as trustees. In our opinion it was impossible to estimate at a money value that prayer in the plaint. Consequently the amount of Court-fee payable for that portion of the claim was Rs. 10 under cl. vi, art. 17 of the second schedule to the Court-fees Act. There was a further prayer for an injunction against interference with the discharge of the duties of the plaintiffs as superintendents. Court-fee was payable in respect of that prayer under s. 7, sub-section 4, clause (d), according to the amount at which the relief sought was valued in the plaint. The relief in this case was valued at Rs. 100. There is nothing to show that this was an improper valuation. The amount of Court-fees payable for that part of the claim was therefore Rs. 7-8-0. The total amount of Court-fees payable was [64] thus Rs. 27-8-0. There was consequently a deficiency of Rs. 10, which the plaintiffs must supply.

We set aside the order of the District Judge rejecting the plaint, and remand the case to his Court with the direction that he should fix a time within which the deficiency should be made good, and, in case of the plaintiffs' failure to supply the deficiency within the time fixed, he should proceed in the manner provided by s. 54 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 526—Transfer of Criminal case—Grounds upon which transfer may be granted.

What the Court has to consider in the case of an application under s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is not merely the question whether there has been any real bias in the mind of the presiding Magistrate against the accused, but also the further question whether incidents may not have happened, which, though they may be susceptible of explanation and may have happened without there being any real bias in the mind of the Magistrate, are nevertheless such as are calculated to create in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension that he may not have a fair and impartial trial. *Dupeyron v. JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN JJ.—This is an application under s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, for the transfer from the Court of the District Magistrate of Mirzapur of a case now pending in that Court, in which one Hanuman Prasad is the complainant and the applicant is the accused. It is urged that an order for the transfer would be expedient in the ends of justice.

It appears that an application for the transfer of the same case was previously made and rejected for reasons stated in the judgment of this Court, dated the 2nd May 1896. We declined to permit the applicant to urge in support of his present application any ground which had been or could have been put forward on the previous occasion.

We must observe that in the affidavit now filed by the applicant reasons have been assigned as justifying the transfer, some of which are futile and some baseless. The affidavit does not satisfy us that the Magistrate has prejudged the case or that there is the [66] slightest ground for supposing that he will not try and decide the case with impartiality, nor is there anything to show that he is biased against the accused. But, as was observed by the Calcutta High Court in a recent case (Dupeyron v. Driver) (1), what the Court has to consider in an application like this is "not merely the question whether there has been any real bias in the mind of the presiding Magistrate against the accused, but also the further question whether incidents may not have happened, which, though they may be susceptible of explanation and may have happened without there being any real bias in the mind of the Magistrate, are nevertheless such as are calculated to create in the mind of the accused a reasonable apprehension that he may not have a fair and impartial trial. We approve of this view. We have to consider whether any such incidents have happened in the present case.

We find that on the 14th of April last the Magistrate, although the charges against the accused were such as would have justified the issue of a warrant in the first instance, and although he was moved by the complainant to issue a warrant, directed a summons only to issue. This certainly was not a circumstance which could be regarded by the accused as indicating the existence of any bias against him in the mind of the Magistrate. Before the date fixed in the summons for the appearance of the accused the first application for transfer had been made to this Court and proceedings in the Magistrate's Court were stayed. When, after the disposal of that application, the case came before the Magistrate, he on the 16th of May 1896 made an order for the issue of a warrant for the arrest of the accused. The Magistrate assigns the following reasons why on this occasion he issued a warrant instead of a summons:—"It is the general belief that Maulvi Farzand Ali will do all he possibly can not to appear in answer to this charge. Rumours are widely current that he is contemplating a pilgrimage to Mecca, or as an alternative that he will cause his death to be given out. It is my belief that a summons will not [67] suffice to secure his attendance." It is true that before making the order he examined the complainant, who said:—"It is the general belief that the accused will not appear." But in the examination of the complainant there is no reference to the rumours mentioned by the Magistrate in his order. In the affidavit which has been filed by the Magistrate he refers as his authority for the rumours to information which had reached him from sources which he believed to be reliable. We infer from this that that information was information which the Magistrate had got out of Court. If this is so, not only did he permit rumours relating to the accused in a case pending before him to reach him out of Court, but he allowed his mind to be influenced by such rumours. The order for the issue of a warrant was, as we have said, passed on the 16th of May 1896. Although the accused was said to be residing in another district, the case was set down for hearing on the 20th of May 1896. That date, we may mention, had been directed by the Government of India to be kept as the birthday of Her Majesty the Queen-Empress. On the 20th of May the Magistrate, without waiting for the return of the warrant, directed the issue of a proclamation under s. 87 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and at the same time ordered the attachment of the whole of the accused's property, moveable and immoveable. Such an order for attachment, we may observe, cannot be made until after the proclamation is issued.

Without for a moment attributing to the Magistrate any desire to act otherwise than in strict accordance with law, and giving him every credit for a wish to act impartially, we feel constrained to say that the hasty procedure of the Magistrate, coupled with his allusion to the rumours referred to above, are incidents which may reasonably create in the mind of the accused an apprehension that his case may not be impartially dealt with by the Magistrate. These incidents have taken place in connection with this very case since the dismissal of the first application for transfer. We therefore think that this is a case in which it is expedient for the ends of justice that an order of transfer should be made.

[68] We accordingly direct that the case be transferred from the Court of the District Magistrate of Mirzapur to that of the District Magistrate of Allahabad.

SHAM LAL (Defendant) v. CHOKHE (Plaintiff).^{*} [21st August, 1896.]Act No. XII of 1881 (N.W.P. Rent Act), s. 42—Assessment of price of crops belonging to an evicted tenant—Effect of such assessment.

Held that where a land-holder having ejected a tenant upon whose holding there are growing crops, applies under s. 42, cl. (c) of Act No. XII of 1881 for assessment of the price, he is bound by the assessment which the Revenue Court may make and cannot afterwards refuse to pay the price fixed.

IN this case the plaintiff sued as the representative of a non-occupancy tenant who had been evicted from his holding under s. 36 of the N. W. P. Rent Act, 1881, to recover a sum of Rs 286-11 with interest, alleged to be due by the zamindar on account of crops standing on the land at the time of his father's eviction, which had been taken at a valuation under the provisions of s. 42 of the Act.

The zamindar-defendant pleaded that he had never accepted the valuation and had appealed against it, and that he had never taken the crop.

The Court of first instance (Deputy Collector of Shahjahanpur) found that the zamindar-defendant had never taken possession of the crop and had refused to accept the estimate of the price made by the Tahsildar, and, holding that the plaintiff remained owner of the crop until the compensation was paid and possession delivered, dismissed the suit.

On appeal by the plaintiff the Lower Appellate Court (District Judge of Shahjahanpur) decreed the appeal and the plaintiff's suit, holding that when once the landlord had applied under s. 42 for an estimate he was bound by it and had no option of refusal.

[69] The defendant appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Madho Prasad, for the appellant.

Mr. W. K. Porter, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—Narain, father of the plaintiff in the suit out of which this appeal has arisen, was a tenant of agricultural land, of which Sham Lal, the defendant in the suit, was the land-holder. The latter procured an order of the Revenue Court for the ejectment of Narain from his holding. At the time it was sought to enforce the ejectment order there were growing crops on the land. When this is the case s. 42 of Act No. XII of 1881 gives the land-holder the option of allowing the tenant to continue to occupy the land, paying adequate rent therefor until the crops have been gathered in. If, however, the land-holder wishes to have immediate possession of the land, he must purchase the crops. If the land-holder desires to adopt the latter alternative, he tenders to the tenant the price of the crops, and clause (b) of s. 42 declares that thereupon the right of the tenant to the crops and to use the land for gathering them in ceases, i.e., the property in the crops passes at once to the land-holder. It is not necessary, in order that the property in the crops should pass, that the tenant should accept the price offered. The mere tender by the landholder is sufficient to divest the tenant of all right to and ownership in the crops. It is not in my opinion necessary that the price tendered should be proved ultimately to be the full price in order that the right to the crop should pass. I consider that it is the intention of the Legislature that the tender of a price, even if inadequate, should suffice for that purpose. This, I hold, is the meaning of cl. (b), s. 42; and the object is to prevent any uncertainty as to the ownership of the crops, which would in all probability result in the crops being damaged. If the landholder and the tenant cannot agree as to the price, either of them is at liberty to apply to the Rent Court to make an award as to the price; and it is declared in cl. (c) of the section, that the amount of the award so made shall be recoverable as an arrear of rent by suit under the Act.

[70] In this case the landholder desired to purchase the crops so as to obtain immediate possession of the land. He, I presume, tendered a price to the tenant which the latter thought to be insufficient, for the landholder had recourse to the provisions of cl. (c) of s. 42 and applied to the Assistant Collector to make an award as to the proper price. The matter was referred to arbitration, and in accordance with the decision of the arbitrators the Assistant Collector passed an order determining the price. The landholder appealed to the Collector, who dismissed the appeal. The tenant's son has now sued to recover the price so awarded and has obtained a decree from the lower appellate Court. The defendant comes here in second appeal.

I am of opinion that the appeal must fail. The question for decision is whether a landholder who has had recourse to the second alternative referred to above, and has expressed an intention of purchasing the crops, can alter his mind, if in his opinion the Rent Court to which a dispute about the price has been referred puts what he considers too high a value on the crop. I think the learned District Judge is perfectly right in holding that the landholder cannot withdraw his offer to purchase. It is possible that the Rent Court may fix what is really too high a price for the crops, but this is a contingency which the landholder must face when he chooses the second of the two alternatives.

The appellant relies on an expression of opinion by the Collector when dismissing the appeal in regard to the award. The Collector in his judgment in that case said that if the landholder thought the price too high, he need not pay, but might let the tenant take away the crops. It is unfortunate for the appellant that the Collector committed himself to this expression of opinion, for in my view it is quite wrong and has misled the appellant.

As the Collector upheld the award, the tenant is by law entitled to recover it, and the decree of the District Judge was right.

The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLENNERHASSETT, J.—A decree for sale upon a mortgage bond was obtained on the 26th of March 1885. On the 6th January 1887 an application for an order for sale was made, and that application was allowed. Apparently the Civil Court transferred the proceedings to the Collector under s. 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The wife of the judgment-debtor filed an objection under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure claiming the property as hers. On the 17th of January 1888 her objection was allowed under s. 280 of the Code, and the attachment was removed. Thereupon the decree holders brought a suit in accordance with s. 283 of the Code against the successful objector, and on the 5th of June 1888 obtained a decree declaring that the property was liable to be sold under the [72] decree and order for sale of the decree-holders. From that decree the successful objector appealed: her appeal was dismissed by the District Judge on the third of August 1888, and her appeal from the decree of the District Judge to the High Court was dismissed on the 28th of May 1892. On the 27th of April 1892, the decree-holders applied for the execution of their decree of the 26th of March 1885. Their application was dismissed on the ground that it was time-barred. They then appealed to the Court of the District Judge and their appeal was dismissed. They have brought this appeal.

The appellants have relied upon Basant Lal v. Batul Bibi (1), upon Chintaman Damodar Agashe v. Balshastri (2), and the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Paras Ram v. Gardner (3).

^{*} Second Appeal No. 416 of 1894 from an order of G. E. Gill, Esq., District Judge of Mainpuri, dated the 3rd April 1894, confirming an order of Pandit Rai Indar Narain, Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, dated the 3rd December 1894.

(1) 6 A. 28.

(2) 16 B. 294.

(3) 1 A. 355.

On the other side the respondent has relied upon an unreported judgment of this Court in F.A. No. 91 of 1891, decided on the 13th of May 1893.

It appears to us that the first two cases relied upon on behalf of the appellants are not in point. Apparently in the case in I.L.R., 6 All. 23, the execution proceedings had been stayed under an order passed under s. 492 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Full Bench case, whether the Full Bench rightly or wrongly decided the case, appears to us to be in favour of the respondent. It shows that the decree-holders had a right to apply for execution or to proceed with their application immediately on the passing of the decree of the 5th of June 1888 declaring that the property was liable to be sold. In our view the allowance of the objection and the passing of the order on the objection under s. 280 of the Code of Civil Procedure determined the application, and the making of the order under s. 283 would have finally determined the right to bring the property to sale, if the suit against the successful objector had not been brought within the year and decided in favour of the holders of the decree for sale. In our opinion art. 178 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation [73] Act, 1877, applies, and, more than three years having elapsed after the 5th of June 1888 before the present application was made, the application was time-barred. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 560—Compensation for frivolous and vexatious complaint—Order in the alternative for imprisonment.

It is not competent to a Court in awarding compensation under s. 560 of the Code of Civil Procedure against a complainant for making a frivolous and vexatious complaint to order at the same time that in default of payment of the compensation the person against whom the order is made suffer imprisonment. *Queen-Empress v. The Judge referred to Queen-Empress v. Punna (1) and Ram Jeevan Koormi v. Doorga Churn Sadukhan (2).
- The reference was laid for disposal before a single Judge * who being inclined to dissent from the ruling in Queen-Empress Punna (1), referred the case to a Division Bench. The following order was passed.

ORDER.

EDGE, C.J., and AIKMAN, J.—We agree with the decision in Queen-Empress v. Punna (1) and, on the recommendation of the Sessions Judge, set aside the order awarding compensation and in default imprisonment.

(1) 18 A. 96.

(2) 21 C. 979.

*[N.B.—The following is the order of reference of the Single Judge. Though this is not given in the I.L.R. Series, yet it has been inserted in extenso for facility of reference:—

KNOX, J.—This case comes up on a reference from the Sessions Judge of Jhansi. It appears from the reference that a Magistrate of the first class after he had tried a case in which one Musammat Manjhli was complainant and Manik Chand and Musammat Amano were accused, discharged the accused, and, being satisfied that the accusation against them was false and malicious, he directed Musammat Manjhli to pay Rs. 50 to Manik Chand and Rs. 10 to Musammat Amano. He further directed that these amounts "should be levied as fines," and if they cannot be realised Musammat Manjhli shall suffer 30 days' simple imprisonment. The reasons upon which the reference is made are that the order is bad because the Magistrate did not comply with clauses (a) and (b) of s. 560 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

I agree with the learned Judge that the record of the Magistrate is distinctly imperfect. No reasons are given for awarding the compensation, and if the Magistrate did record and consider any objections which the complainant urged against the making of the direction (which I think he did) they were very imperfectly recorded. The learned Judge takes a further exception to the Magistrate's order, and says that the Magistrate had no authority to pass the order as to imprisonment until some attempt had been made to recover the amount awarded as compensation; the two orders were illegal; and he cites as his authority the case of Queen-Empress v. Punna (I.L.R., 18 All. 96) and Ram Jeevan Koormi v. Doorga Churn Sadhu Khan (I.L.R., 21 Calc. 979). The case last quoted is undoubtedly an authority for saying that it is illegal to make an order for imprisonment until some attempt has been made to levy the amount of compensation in the manner prescribed for the levying of a fine. The learned Judges say that they are not aware of any provisions of law under which a fine is recoverable by imprisonment. They quote s. 386 of the Code Criminal Procedure, s. 64 of the Indian Penal Code, and s. 33 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. Apparently their attention was not directed to s. 5 of Act No. I of 1868, which enacts that the provisions of ss. 63 to 70, both inclusive, of the Indian Penal Code and of s. 386 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shall apply to all fines imposed under the authority of any Act hereafter to be passed, unless such Act shall contain an express provision to the contrary. So far as I am aware, the Code of Criminal Procedure contains no express provision to the contrary. Sections 386 and 388 of the Code of Criminal Procedure recognise that the rule is that when an offender is sentenced to pay a fine, whether for an offence or otherwise, it is competent to the Court to direct by the sentence of fine that in default of payment of fine the offender shall suffer imprisonment for a certain term. The former section authorises the Court to issue a warrant for the levy of fine by distress and sale of moveable property, and the latter section authorises the Court to suspend the execution of the sentence of imprisonment. The authorities considered by the Calcutta Court were cases decided under the Code of 1872, which did contain an express provision to the contrary of s. 5 of Act No. I of 1868. If the case of Queen-Empress v. Punna was intended to lay down the same rule, which is doubtful, I find myself unable to follow it.

The Magistrate's order is open to a more serious objection. S. 560 of the Code of Criminal Procedure was intended for cases, and only for cases, in which the Magis-(1896) 178.Act No. XLV of 1860 (Indian Penal Code), s. 451—House trespass with intent to commit adultery—Evidence.

To sustain a conviction under s. 451 of the Indian Penal Code for the offence of house trespass with intent to commit an offence, the prospective offence being adultery, it is necessary to show that there has been no consent or connivance on the part of the husband of the woman the intent to commit adultery with whom is charged against the accused.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and AIKMAN, J.—Brij Basi was charged before a Magistrate with having committed the offence of lurking house trespass by night with intent to commit theft punishable under s. 457 of the Indian Penal Code. The Magistrate, finding on the evidence that Brij Basi had no intent to commit theft, altered the charge to one of house trespass in order to the committing of an offence punishable with imprisonment, specifying [75] the offence as adultery with the wife of one Ram Gopal, and convicted Brij Basi under s. 451 of the Indian Penal Code. Brij Basi appealed. The Sessions Judge, agreeing with the Magistrate, dismissed the appeal. Brij Basi has brought this application in revision. Ram Gopal was not the complainant. The complaint was preferred by a nephew of Ram Gopal, who was also living in the house. Ram Gopal was not called as a witness, and there was no evidence that Brij Basi had gone to the house to have connection with the wife of Ram Gopal without the connivance and without the consent of Ram Gopal. The offence of criminal adultery, i.e., of adultery which is recognised by the Indian Penal Code as a criminal offence, is not committed unless connection with the married woman is without the connivance and without the consent of her husband. It is the first principle of criminal law that where a statute creates a criminal offence the ingredients of that criminal offence must be strictly proved, and that where the doing of an act without consent or without authority is made a criminal offence, and the statute does not expressly put upon the accused the proof of such consent or authority, it is a necessary part trate was satisfied that the accusation brought was frivolous or vexatious. It was not intended for a case like this, in which the Magistrate has found that the complaint is evidently false and malicious. False and malicious complaints call for more serious punishment, and the law provides for their being punished in quite a different way. I direct that this reference be laid before a Bench of two Judges.]

of the case for the prosecution to negative by evidence such consent or authority. In this case, if Brij Basi had actually been caught in the act of sexual intercourse with the wife of Ram Gopal, assuming that he knew her to be Ram Gopal's wife, the offence of criminal adultery would not have been made out without proof that such sexual intercourse was without the consent and without the connivance of Ram Gopal. Brij Basi was convicted of a house trespass in order to commit a criminal adultery with the wife of Ram Gopal. It was consequently necessary to support the prosecution to prove that if Brij Basi had had sexual intercourse on that occasion with the wife of Ram Gopal, it would have been without Ram Gopal's consent or connivance. The Court cannot make assumptions against prisoners in the absence of necessary evidence for the prosecution, and there was no evidence here to show that Brij Basi did commit the trespass in order to commit criminal adultery as that offence is [76] defined by the statute. It was not even proved that Brij Basi had committed criminal trespass on this occasion. There would be no intent on his part to commit criminal adultery or to insult or annoy the owner of the house, Ram Gopal, unless Brij Basi was there to commit criminal adultery with the wife of Ram Gopal, i.e., to have sexual intercourse with her without the consent and without the connivance of Ram Gopal. There could be no intent to insult or annoy Ram Gopal if Ram Gopal was consenting or conniving at the adultery, and there is nothing in this case to show whether or not Ram Gopal was a consenting or conniving party. We allow this application, and we quash the conviction and the order of the Sessions Judge, and, acquitting Brij Basi of the offence of which he was convicted, order him to be at once released.

On appeal from the High Court at Allahabad.

A. B. MILLER, OFFICIAL ASSIGNEE OF THE ESTATE OF RAMKISHEN DAS (Defendant-Appellant) v. BABU MADHO DAS (Plaintiff-Respondent). [17th and 18th June, 24th and 28th July, 1896.]

Insolvency—Attempted preference—Evidence as to statement of a party to a suit, before proceedings—Act No. I of 1872, (Indian Evidence Act), Ss. 18 and 21.

After an adjudication, under the Statute XI, Vic. Cap. 21, of insolvency against a trader in Calcutta, a creditor brought this suit against him, and the official assignee as co-defendant, the latter alone defending. The claim was for payment of a debt, and in default to obtain an order for the sale of land upon which the creditor averred that he had an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds with him, before the adjudication, as security for the debt:—Held, that the burden was upon the plaintiff of proving the deposit, by way of equitable mortgage to have preceded the adjudication.

The courts below having differed as to whether this prior possession had or had not been proved, an examination of the evidence led to the conclusion that the plaintiff had failed to prove that the title-deeds had been deposited before the date of the adjudication, as alleged by him.

On the question whether the courts below should, or should not, have received in evidence the testimony of a witness who had been informed by the [77] plaintiff before the adjudication that documents relating to land had then been deposited with him as security by the person, who was afterwards insolvent and who was the first defendant in this suit:—Held, that this being an admission by a party within s. 21 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, could not be used as evidence in the plaintiff's favour. And held, that an erroneous omission to object to the admission of such testimony did not make it available as a ground of judgment.

APPEAL from a decree (10th May 1892) of the High Court, reversing a decree (9th April 1890) of the District Judge of Mirzapur.

This suit, instituted on the 6th June 1889, claimed enforcement of an equitable mortgage alleged by the plaintiff to have been effected by the deposit of title-deeds with him by the first defendant, Ramkishan Das, who, having a business in Calcutta, had been adjudicated insolvent on the 2nd March 1889, under the XI Vic. Cap. 21. The immoveables said to have been mortgaged were land, houses, and buildings in thirty-two lots, of which twenty-six were in the Benares district, five in that of Mirzapur, and one in that of Ghazipur, valued at about Rs. 70,000. The plaintiff, Madho Das, now respondent, a banker of Benares, claimed, on account of hundis and interest, Rs. 1,35,304, and in default an order for the sale of the property above-mentioned in respect of that debt, Ramkishan Das, who left Calcutta finally in August 1888, and Benares in the following October, abandoning his business, did not appear to answer the suit, which was defended by the co-defendant alone, the official assignee of the insolvent's estate and effects. In the course of their business together, Ramkishan had drawn upon the plaintiff, in March 1885, four hundis for Rs. 25,000, payable at 11 months date. These were renewed year by year till January 1887. The case for the plaintiff was that when the renewal of the total amount in another hundi was asked for by Ramkishan, the plaintiff pressed him for payment, refusing to renew. The result was that Ramkishan in February 1888 in Calcutta, according to the plaintiff, handed over to the gumashtas sent down by the latter from Benares, the title-deeds of the properties as security for the payment of the [78] debt. On the 6th May 1889, the plaintiff informed the official assignee that these securities were in his possession, and asked for a consent to a sale of the properties. The official assignee disputed the plaintiff's right to the title-deeds. On the 6th June following the Calcutta Insolvency Court ordered Ramkishan and his gumashta to attend to be examined in the matter of the insolvency, and to produce all documents. On that date the plaintiff filed, in the court of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur, this suit, afterwards on the 19th September 1889 transferred to the District Judge's file. The official assignee's answer, filed on the 10th September, as to his information and belief, in reference to the alleged deposit of the title-deeds, was that they had been obtained by the plaintiff at some time after the adjudication, and transferred with intent to defeat and delay creditors. So that, if that was the fact, the transaction was a fraudulent preference. The principal questions at the hearing were whether the deeds were "deposited by the first defendant with the plaintiff or his agents in Calcutta in February 1888 with the object to create a charge in favour of the plaintiff."

Generally stated, the plaintiff's allegation was that his gumashtas went down from Benares to Calcutta after the Sheoratri festival, which would make their arrival to have been about the 10th February 1888, and received the deeds on behalf of their master. On the other side, the case presented on behalf of the official assignee was that the possession of the deeds was most probably obtained through Ramkishen's friend and servant Sanwal Das, and another person Brijrawan Das, who by means of a letter produced, which was dated 27th February 1889, caused Harkishen Das, at that time custodian of the deeds at Benares on behalf of Ramkishen, to hand them over to Jagmohun Das, the plaintiff's agent for the purpose of receiving them; and that this was not done before the 2nd March 1889.

The facts, in full detail, appear in their Lordships' judgment.

At one time, in the course of the proceeding, there was an issue of law raised. This was whether the delivery of title-deeds [79] by Ramkishen in Calcutta would effectuate a valid mortgage of property in the North-Western Provinces. This question was decided by the High Court in the affirmative in the judgment now appealed from, and from that decision no appeal was preferred. A report of that part of the judgment is given in Madho Das v. Ramkishen (1).

Another question of law not raised until the hearing of this appeal had regard to the inadmissibility under the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, of testimony setting forth statements by parties to suits, before proceedings, when in their own favour.

On the record was the evidence of Rai Baleshwar Prasad, (pronounced to be unimpeachable by the High Court.) that in the beginning of September 1888, he had a conversation with the plaintiff, Babu Madho Das, in which the affairs of Ramkishen were mentioned; and that, in the course of that conversation, the plaintiff said that he had taken certain documents from Ramkishen relating to gardens and houses.

So much of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, as relates to the question raised in reference to that evidence, is as follows:—

"Section 18. Statements made by a party to the proceeding, or by an agent to any such party, whom the Court regards under the circumstances as expressly or impliedly authorized by him to make them, are admissions. Section 21. Admissions are relevant and may be proved as against the person who makes them, or his representative in interest, but they cannot be proved by or on behalf of the person who makes them or his representative in interest, except in the following cases:—

"(1) An admission may be proved by or on behalf of the person making it when it is of such a nature that if the person making it were dead, it would be relevant as between third persons under s. 32.

"(2) An admission may be proved by, or on behalf of the person making it when it consists of a statement of the existence of any state of mind or body, relevant or in issue, [80] made at or about the time when such a state of mind or body existed and is accompanied by conduct rendering its falsehood improbable.

"(3) An admission may be proved by or on behalf of the person making it, if it is relevant otherwise than as an admission.

"Illustration (a).—The question, between A and B is whether a certain deed is, or is not forged."

"A affirms that it is genuine, B that it is forged."

(1) 14 A. 298.

"A may prove a statement by B that the deed is genuine, and B may prove a statement by A that the deed is forged; but A cannot prove a statement by himself that the deed is genuine, nor can B prove a statement by himself that the deed is forged."

The District Judge decided the suit in favour of the Official Assignee for reasons which he gave at length, but these he summed up as follows:—

"(1) There is no independent evidence to prove the delivery; what evidence there is consists entirely of plaintiff's servants' statements.

"(2) By the end of 1888 plaintiff certainly knew that defendant 1 was absconding from his creditors; and, if he had this security, he would naturally have, at least, threatened to enforce it before 2nd March 1889, when defendant 1 was adjudicated insolvent; but no one, outside plaintiff's office ever saw or heard definitely of, the title-deeds until after 2nd March 1889.

"(3) The date of delivery cannot be ascertained, we cannot get nearer than this that it was made about the middle of February 1888.

"(4) There is not a line of writing to evidence the delivery. It is true that a memo is not necessary, but considering the very large number of title-deeds and the position and circumstances of plaintiff and defendant 1, it is hardly conceivable that the delivery would have taken place without a list, or memo., of some kind. Indeed Baldeo says a list of title-deeds was made at the time, but it was destroyed. His account of this list is, however, incredible, viz., that it contained no specification of the [81] documents otherwise than by dates (except in a few instances); only the localities in which the houses were situate were also entered.

"(5) The letter dated 29th January 1888, Ex. No. 17, is intimately connected with the alleged verbal promise to deliver; but it does not contain the least allusion to such delivery, and the absence of such allusion is almost inconceivable.

"(6) Previous correspondence, especially letter dated 14th July 1885, shows that plaintiff did not care for this very security, and certainly was not likely to accept it as adequate security, for his debt of 1½ lakhs of rupees.

"(7) Plaintiff's possession of the title deeds is accounted for by the letter dated 27th February 1889. There can I think be no reasonable doubt that it was written at plaintiff's instance, in consequence of his pressure for payment, and insisting on some arrangement being made for the payment of his debt. In pursuance of these instructions, what title-deeds were proved were made over to plaintiff's agents at Benares."

In reference to the other issue the Judge gave his opinion that if the documents had really been delivered in February 1888, as asserted by the plaintiff, it would have been shown that the object was to create a charge upon them in favour of the plaintiff; that in such a transaction, at that date, there would have been no suspicion of fraud; and that under s. 59 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, an equitable mortgage, by deposit of title-deeds, if made in Calcutta, would affect lands outside of Calcutta.

As it was thus found that there was no equitable mortgage, the Mirzapur Court had no jurisdiction, as the plaintiff's claim would be reduced to a mere money demand cognizable in the Insolvent Court.

The suit was accordingly dismissed.

From this judgment the plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

The Official Assignee filed cross-objections, which, however, were not relied upon at the hearing of the appeal.

[82] The High Court (TYRRELL and KNOX, JJ.) reversed the judgment and decree of the District Judge, and decreed in favour of the plaintiff.

Upon the main issue the Judges came to the conclusion that the evidence of the plaintiff's servants, Baldeo Tiwari and Bhagwan Das, as to the delivery of the title-deeds in February 1888, was substantially correct and faithful, and that it had been discredited on insufficient grounds by the Court below. They also accepted and relied on the corroborative evidence as to the deposit of the title-deeds with Gambhir Chand, and their entry in the "jagar bahi" at Benares. They placed much weight upon the statements made by the witnesses Rai Baleshwar Prasad, and Rai Shyam Kishen, gentlemen of high position in Benares, as to statements made to them by the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively, in September 1888, that documents had been handed to the former by the latter, to satisfy him in regard to his claim. Upon the case set up by the defendant the High Court disbelieved the statement that Harkishen Das was ever in possession at Benares of the title deeds in dispute. They believed that the papers shown by the plaintiff to Nobo Dip Chandar at 7 A.M., on the 3rd March 1889, were the title-deeds which the plaintiff had held since February 1888. And they were of opinion on an examination of dates and times that it was highly improbable that they could have been the papers which Harkishen Das said that he handed over to Jagmohan Das on the morning of the 2nd March.

The Judges accepted it as a fact that the letter of the 27th February 1889, was the bona fide composition of Sanwal and Brijrawan. They considered that the letter did not refer to the title-deeds in question, which, according to their view, were never in the possession of Harkishen Das; but that it might have referred to certain miscellaneous documents, lying at Benares, which related to Ramkishen's property at large, and which might have contained information useful to the plaintiff in reference to an independent claim upon the latter by Ramkishen's mother. Upon the question as to the effect of the deposit of title-deeds in Calcutta, as creating [83] an equitable mortgage of lands elsewhere, they agreed with the District Judge.

On this appeal preferred by the Official Assignee—

Mr. A. Cohen, Q. C., and Mr. J. H. A. Branson, for the appellant, argued that the High Court should have approved the finding of the District Judge. The appellant had a duty in protection of the creditors upon Ramkishen's estate to require the plaintiff Madho Das to prove his claim. The burden was upon the latter, and he had not discharged it. The High Court had omitted to notice many serious discrepancies and contradictions in the evidence of the plaintiff's witnesses, and had placed reliance on evidence that, according to the Indian Evidence Act, was inadmissible. They referred to the admission of the evidence of the two witnesses Rai Baleshwar Prasad and Rai Shyam Kishen. There was no guarantee for the correctness of the statement made to them, however truly and accurately they might have testified as to what they had heard.

Again, in the High Court's judgment the evidence for the defence had not received due effect. The High Court had not placed the right construction on the important letter of the 27th February 1889, and had not seen how far greater probability attached to delivery of the deeds having been at the later date indicated by the witnesses for the defence; than their having been deposited at the undefined time suggested in the plaintiff's case.

Mr. T. H. Cowie and Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the respondent, contended that the High Court was right in accepting the evidence as to the delivery of the title-deeds about the 10th of February, 1888, and in declining to be guided by the comparatively slender evidence that they had not been delivered till the 2nd March, 1889. Both the Courts below were right in holding that the delivery alleged by the plaintiff would have, if proved, constituted a valid equitable mortgage of the properties. The judgment of the High Court should be affirmed.

Counsel for the appellant were not called on to reply.

[84] Afterwards, on the 28th July, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR R. COUCH:—

JUDGMENT.

Ramkishan Das who carried on a large business in Calcutta was on the 2nd of March 1889 adjudicated an insolvent by the High Court at Calcutta and his estate became vested in the appellant as the Official Assignee. On the 6th of May 1889 the respondent's pleaders wrote and sent a letter to the appellant stating that the respondent was a creditor of the insolvent for Rs. 1,53,339 on balance of account with interest, that the respondent held as collateral security for his debt the title-deeds and documents of certain houses and lands situate at Benares, Ghazipur and Mirzapur of the value of Rs. 65 to 70,000, and that the title-deeds of the properties were delivered to the respondent by the insolvent himself at Calcutta in February 1888. And they inquired whether the appellant was prepared to admit the equitable mortgage. On the next day the appellant replied by letter that it would be necessary for him to make inquiries into the matter of the mortgage claim, and if the respondent could prove the mortgage to the satisfaction of the Insolvent Court he would be prepared to consent to the usual order for sale. He added that in the meanwhile he would be obliged if they would send for his inspection a copy of the memorandum which accompanied the deposit of the title-deeds. On the 13th of May the pleaders replied that they were prepared to give the appellant sufficient time to make inquiries, but as he appeared to insist upon their proving the claim in the Insolvent Court, and made it a condition of accepting the mortgagee's right, they were prepared to seek their remedy in a court having jurisdiction to try the question at issue. They added that if the appellant wished to settle the matter out of court they were prepared to give him every facility in making inquiries into the matter, and for this reason they gave him one week's time to make up his mind with reference to the subject of their claim. On the 17th of May the appellant acknowledged the receipt of this letter, and referring to his of the 9th reminded them that they had not complied with the request in it for a copy of the memorandum, [85] and again asked for it. To this the pleaders on the 21st of May replied "by letter" that the title-deeds of certain houses, &c. were made "over to Babu Madho Das my client's agents Bhagwan Das and Baldevajee at Calcutta as collateral security for his debts. No written memo accompanied the title-deeds at the time of their deposit and for this reason we cannot furnish a copy of the same." On the 6th of June 1889 an order was made by the High Court at Calcutta for the respondent and his gumashta to attend before the Court and be examined in the matter of the insolvency and to produce the documents and deeds said to have been deposited. On the same day the respondent filed his plaint in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur against Ramkishen and the appellant praying for a decree for the amount claimed for debt and that in default of payment the properties alleged to have been mortgaged might be sold and the proceeds applied in payment. The appellant in his written statement denied that the title-deeds were deposited as alleged in the plaint.

On the 19th of September 1889 the suit was transferred from the Court of the Subordinate Judge to the Court of the District Judge of Mirzapur. Of the nine issues framed by him the only one which is now material is the fourth. That is:—"Were the title deeds specified in paragraph 6 of the plaint deposited by defendant 1 with plaintiff or his agents in Calcutta in February 1888?" The District Judge, in a judgment where the evidence is fully and carefully discussed, found that it was not proved that the title-deeds were delivered to the respondent's gumashtas in Calcutta in February 1888 and dismissed the suit. The respondent appealed to the High Court at Allahabad. That Court came to the opposite conclusion and made a decree in the plaintiff's favour which is the subject of the present appeal.

Now the onus was on the respondent to prove that the title-deeds, which, it appeared, were in his possession when the letter of the 6th of May was sent were deposited by Ramkishen with him or his agents before the adjudication of insolvency. His case depended mainly upon the evidence of Baldeo Tiwari (the Balde-[86]vaje in the letter of the 21st of May) and Bhagwan Das, and their Lordships will first consider their evidence. Baldeo was first examined. He is the gumashta of the respondent and had then been in his service for eleven years. His account of the deposit of the title-deeds was this. There had been for some years large transactions between Ramkishen and the respondent in hundis drawn by the former and accepted by the latter and from time to time renewed. On the 27th of December 1887, a hundi having become mature and the time for renewal having arrived, Ramkishen drew a hundi for one lakh of rupees and sent it to the respondent from Calcutta requesting him to accept it. The respondent refused to accept it, which occasioned a delay of nearly a month. Then Ramkishen came to Benares on the occasion of a marriage in the house of one of his relations. After the completion of the marriage the respondent told the witness that Ramkishen had come to Benares and said:—"Go to him and dun him. Tell him that I shall never renew this hundi; nay I shall bring an action. Go to Ramkishen and tell him so." "After a day or two I went to Ramkishen and said This time the plaintiff will by no means renew the hundi." Then Ramkishenji said to me go and tell the plaintiff that I paid him off when Rs. 2,75,000 was due by me. Now a small balance is due.' I then came and said so to the plaintiff, who again said to me—'Go and say that I won't listen.' I then went and told Ramkishenji that the plaintiff was inflexible. Then Ramkishen said to me—'Go and tell the plaintiff that if he does not agree I will on my return to Calcutta give him what papers I have for his satisfaction.' Nay Ram (Ramkishen) had said to me—'If you come yourself I will give the papers to you or the plaintiff may send any one he likes.' I went and told this to the plaintiff. This talk took place in the course of two or three days. I told Ramkishenji—'The plaintiff will not believe my words unless you write a letter to him.' Then Ramkishen

"had written a letter to the plaintiff in my presence and handed to me open. There was no one when I had been there. . . I came to the plaintiff with the letter and I too explained [87] to the plaintiff that this time Ramkishen offered also to pay interest on the hundis and to deliver on his return to Calcutta his title-deeds by way of security and that he should agree to it. The plaintiff then said to me—'Remember well to draw a hundi on Ramkishen immediately on the expiration of the term promised by him.'"

The letter referred to was produced. It is as follow:—From Ramkishen to B. Madho Das. "Sir—my compliments to you. I send herewith 4 hundis for Rs. 1,00,000. Sign them and send them with interest to Rajah Shimdhu Narain Singh. I shall after I have reached Calcutta send you the interest in 15 or 20 days or you may otherwise draw a hundi. . . . A sum of nearly Rs. 1,48,000 will be found due to you in respect of the Nij account up to Sambat 94. I shall pay the whole of this sum together with interest according to account up to November 1888, and shall not make another promise nor shall I give you the trouble to renew the Rajah Sahib's hundis. I shall write the particulars to you after I have compared what you have written. The rest is all right. Dated 29th January 1888." The witness said he told Ramkishen the respondent would not believe his word unless he wrote a letter to him, and yet there is nothing in this letter about the most important matter. In a later part of his evidence he gave a different account of when the letter was written. He said that subsequently to the writing of the letter came the proposal for the delivery of documents. "Babu Ramkishen had proposed the delivery of documents, I myself made no inquiry from Ramkishen regarding the documents. On the contrary Ramkishen himself had said—'This time the plaintiff does not trust me and does not accept the hundi in favour of the Rajah Sahib. Therefore I myself shall deliver the title-deeds of houses to him when he or his man comes.' Ere the writing of this letter Ramkishen had not in my presence made mention of the delivery of the documents." It is evident that at this stage of his examination, having seen the effect of the letter upon what he had before said, he sought to [88] get out of the difficulty by saying that the proposal to deliver the documents was made after the letter was written; but then it may be asked why if, as he had said, the respondent would not believe his words without a letter he did not have this proposal added in the letter; and why if he told the respondent of the offer the latter did not notice that it was not in the letter and was satisfied without having it in. Which is the more probable, that the witness has not told the truth about what passed between him and Ramkishen and what he told the respondent, or that if he has the letter would have said nothing about it? It is to be observed that Ramkishen, the only person present, had left Calcutta after the adjudication of insolvency and could not be found. Most likely the witness knew this and had no fear of being contradicted or punished for giving false evidence, and he must from his position have been considerably under the power and influence of the respondent. About the deposit of the title-deeds the witness said that he and Bhagwan Das went to Calcutta by order of the plaintiff to take the title-deeds; they called on Ramkishen and said:—"Please give us what you promised at Benares and leave to go back." The witness, Bhagwan Das, and Ramkishen were there, there was no one else. He demanded the title-deeds from Ramkishen according to his promise : Ramkishen put them off on two or three days successively, and finally took the papers which were in the cloth bundle with a list in English out of a box and gave them to the witness who made a list of them in Hindi. There were 33 documents and 55 papers connected with them. The witness requested Ramkishen to write a letter and give it to him, and Ramkishen said—"There is no occasion for a letter. Take away these papers without it, as the letter if written will require registration, &c." The witness said that when they were not accompanied by any letter or any other writing how could the transaction be considered to be a mortgage : and thereupon he said—"Take them away as I say, such is the practice in the town." Their Lordships doubt whether it can be the practice in Calcutta to take mortgage by [89] deposit of title-deeds without a memorandum in writing, but it may be suggested that Ramkishen said this because he wished to conceal the transaction as it would affect his credit. The witness went on to say that he left the papers with Babu Gambhir Chand for three or four days until he went back to Benares, when he took them from him and went to Benares and delivered them to the respondent. Bhagwan Das, who was in the respondent's service and had been his gumashta for thirteen or fourteen years, deposed that Baldeo and he went from Benares and reached Calcutta on the next day and went to Ramkishen instantly and saw him at his office, that they said to him they were ready for the purpose for which he wanted them and he asked them to come to him on the next day or the day after. So far as he believed, they went to him on the next day in the afternoon; he took them upstairs to his private room and brought a bundle from a box; there was a list in it in English and the bundle contained title-deeds. Ramkishen having seen the list and the papers was giving title-deeds to Baldeo after marking his list. Baldeo prepared a list of title-deeds in Hindi in the order in which Ramkishen gave them to him. The number of the papers was compared with both lists and Baldeo said—"Please give a letter and cash also. It would not be proper to give the papers alone to the plaintiff." Ramkishen replied—"I tried to make arrangement for money, but I could not succeed in that behalf. It will be irregular to write a letter in connection with this mortgage. It is the law of the town of Calcutta, I shall pay the money within the time agreed upon. As the plaintiff has lost patience now I will very soon get the title-deeds returned by payment of money. It will be invalid to write a letter for it will require registration." Then the witness said—"Babu Sahib, i.e., the plaintiff, would not be pleased without taking money. Please give money along with this." He replied—"There is no opportunity now. I shall remit money as soon as possible and get the things returned." Having taken the list and papers they went to the firm where Gambhir Chand was a gumashta and Baldeo said to him—"Please [90] keep these papers, I shall take them back while going to Benares." Baldeo having opened the bundle the papers were counted with reference to the list and taken by Gambhir Chand. They went to him five or six days afterwards and took the papers from him and the next day left Calcutta for Benares. On their arrival at Benares the papers were given by them to the respondent, and he ordered them to go and get the same credited in the account book of the firm, which was done by Saligram, munib. In a later part of his evidence the witness said that when Gambhir Chand returned the bundle of papers to Baldeo he read four or five of the papers, that the papers which he read contained both Hindi and Persian; he did not recollect whether Gambhir Chand said anything by reading the papers or not.

The Judges of the High Court have said that after mature consideration they had come to the conclusion that the testimony of these two men is substantially and in all its main characteristics correct and faithful. Their Lordships greatly doubt whether, having regard to the position of the men and the want of corroboration in writing, this opinion could reasonably be come to. Gambhir Chand, who said he was the munib gumashta of one of the largest native banking firms in Calcutta and had been their gumashta for about twenty-six years, was a witness for the respondent. He deposed that Bhagwan and Baldeo kept title-deeds with them about two years before the trial. The title-deeds were with them for about three or four days; he asked what were the papers, and they answered they got them from Babu Ramkishen. A bundle of documents was shown to the witness, and he said—"These are the papers and I recognize them by the seal of the Kazi." The witness asked them why a particular document was not stamped and they said—"It bears the seal of the Kazi"; they pointed out other papers bearing the seal of the Kazi, and thus he then identified the papers. In cross-examination he said the only means of identification were the seals, that he had not seen the Kazi's seal before, he had never seen seals of this kind before or after the deposit of the papers; he did not know English or Persian, but he [91] noticed the Kazi's seal. Although the identification of the papers may be insufficient, if the witness was speaking the truth when he said that papers were left with him by Bhagwan and Baldeo and they said at the time they gave them to him that they got them from Ramkishen it would be some corroboration of their evidence. Their Lordships are not satisfied with the reason given by the District Judge for disregarding it. It was also sought to corroborate Bhagwan and Baldeo by the entry in the account book, and the evidence of Salig Ram, Ramman Lal and Madho Lal. It is unnecessary to go into the details of this. Their Lordships agree with the District Judge who said he did not attach much weight to this portion of the evidence. The High Court in its judgment says the entry was one which it was easy to make and it was entered in a book which could easily be tampered with.

The next evidence to be noticed is that of Baleshwar Prasad and Rai Shyam Kishen, upon which the High Court has laid great stress, and whose integrity the District Judge said he could not for a moment question. Baleshwar Prasad, who was examined before a Commissioner, deposed that a conversation between the respondent and himself in the beginning of September 1888 turned upon the state of affairs of Ramkishen, that the witness said he had heard that his affairs were not at all satisfactory and that he had left Calcutta never to return, and he advised the respondent to realize the money due by Ramkishen to him, and the respondent answered that as far as practicable he was making endeavours to get his money. He also said he had taken certain documents relating to gardens and houses, and that Ramkishen had also promised to allow him time to pay the money due on Rajah Sambhu Narayan Singh's hundi. He did not recollect whether the respondent mentioned to him the time when the documents were made over by Ramkishen to him. The witness also said on cross-examination that he recollected a conversation with the respondent about the delivery of these documents on two occasions, one was when the respondent was summoned to Calcutta to give evidence relating to Ramkishen's affairs and the other about ten or twelve days before [92] the trial. Shyam Kishen deposed that about the end of August or beginning of September 1888 he had a conversation with the respondent and Ramkishen, the respondent had said to him :—"You are a friend of Babu Ramkishen ; kindly tell him to pay the debt due to me as I am in want of money ;" that he spoke to Ramkishen who said the respondent should not be uneasy about his money as he had given over documents to satisfy him. The Judges of the High Court say in their judgment of these witnesses "If this witness (Shyam Kishen) is truthful and accurate the plaintiff's case is true. If this plaintiff's case is false then this witness has deliberately and wilfully sworn to a false tale. There is no alternative theory. The circumspect precision as to date precludes the explanation that the witness was honest but was by mistake referring to September 1888, occurrences of another and much later date. Similar observations apply to the evidence of Babu Baleshwar Prasad."

Now s. 21 of the "Indian Evidence Act, 1872," enacts that admissions are relevant and may be proved as against the person who makes them, or his representative in interest, but they cannot be proved by or on behalf of the person who makes them, or by his representative in interest, except in three cases named, of which the present case is not one. The meaning of this section is very plainly illustrated by the illustration (a) to the section. As to the evidence of Baleshwar Prasad, therefore, the Judges of the High Court have given very great weight to what according to law was not relevant evidence and could not be proved on behalf of the respondent. The erroneous omission before of the Commissioner and the District Court to object to its admission did not make it relevant and their Lordships must in this appeal, as the High Court should have done, entirely disregard it. The evidence of Shyam Kishen of a statement by Ramkishen, if the statement was made before the adjudication of insolvency, is relevant and should be considered. As to this the District Judge said he was a young man who seemed to have vague ideas of time and space and that this evidence was hard to believe. It has been seen that the [93] High Court fully believed his evidence. Their Lordships without in the least imputing to the witness an intention to give false evidence think that the conversation he deposed to is of doubtful value. This was the respondent's case, with the addition that he had possession of the title-deeds after the adjudication of insolvency on the 2nd of March 1889 and the evidence of his attorney relating to it. The appellant sought to show that the respondent obtained the possession after that date. For this purpose he put in a letter dated the 27th of February 1889, written by Bijrawan Das, who had been the head gumashta of Ramkishen for 17 or 18 years, and addressed to Harkishen Das, the gumashta of Ramkishen at Benares. It enclosed a letter as follows :—"Sanwal Das pays his compliments to Bhai Harkishen Das. Show to Babu Jagmohan Dasji the very time he may ask you to show him all the old papers in respect of the Benares property or any other place. Out of those papers give him any papers which he may think fit to be sent. Make a list of the same and make those papers over to him. He will forward them to me. Do this work quietly. Don't delay in showing him the papers. 27th February 1889." The letter then ran—"Dear Harkishen Das. I Bijrawan Das pray for your welfare. In accordance with this letter show to Babu Jagmohan Das all the papers you have about the houses. Don't speak to anybody about this. (Signed) Bijrawan Das. Give him any of these papers which he may ask you to be sent here." Bijrawan Das deposed that he was Ramkishen's munsib for seventeen or eighteen years in Calcutta. He was formerly in Benares and used to attend to Ramkishen's work there. When he went away to Calcutta Harkishen Das, his nephew, used to work. Ramkishen Das regularly lived in Calcutta and used to visit Benares occasionally. Sanwal Das was his regular attorney for eight or nine months before the business fell in to disorder. The deeds relating to the Calcutta property used to be kept by Ramkishen himself and Harkishen Das used to keep the deeds relating to the properties in Benares, Gazipur and Mirzapur. About the letter he said :—"When the plaintiff (the respondent) was very pressing "in his [94] demands then Babu Sanwal Das gave him a letter "about making over certain papers to him. Sanwal Das handed "that letter to me also and I also wrote on it. That letter was sent to "Harkishen Das. That letter was written about the papers, namely, the "deeds in dispute. The latter clause is in my handwriting. The plaintiff was present when this letter was written." Harkishen Das deposed that he received the letter by post on the 1st or 2nd of March, that Jagmohan Das is the respondent's son-in-law; he came to him in the afternoon of the day he received the letter and went away without seeing the papers, saying he would come next morning. He came the next morning bringing a clerk with him and having selected thirteen bundles of papers took them and gave a receipt for them in his own handwriting. The receipt was not produced, the witness saying that he received a letter from Sanwal Das asking him to send it, which he said he had not got and it was not produced, and he sent the receipts enclosed in a letter to Sanwal Das. Afterwards on reading a list signed by Jagmohan Das he said the number should be twelve not thirteen. The respondent did not after this evidence had been given offer to examine either Jagmohan or Sanwal. although Harkishen had in his examination in the Insolvent Court in July 1889 more than seven months before the trial deposed that he had received a letter from Sanwal Das about the title-deeds instructing him to send them to Jagmohan Das and he carried out those instructions and made over the title-deeds to him. It was not the duty of the appellant to call either of those persons.

Upon this part of the case their Lordships are unable to agree with the High Court in its opinion that the letter of the 27th of February did not refer to the title-deeds in suit, and they do not see any ground for the High Court speaking of the appellant's "case being surrounded with difficulties, ambiguities and demonstrated falsehoods, the main part of their "position being almost certainly shown to be untrue." Upon the whole of the evidence they are of opinion that the respondent failed to prove that the title-deeds were deposited as a security for his debt as he alleged, [95] and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decree of the District Court, omitting from it the exception from the costs of defendant No. 2 (the appellant) of the costs of the witnesses Gregory and Apar, and Baba Kumar Guka and Norendro Nath Sen, which should not have been disallowed, and to reverse the decree of the High Court and order the appeal to it to be dismissed with costs. The respondent will pay the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

PRESENT:

*Lords Waston, Hobhouse, Macnaghten and Davey, and Sir R. Couch.[On petition relating to an appeal from a decree of the High Court at Allahabad.]*MUHAMMAD IKRAM-UD-DIN (Defendant) v. MUSAMMAT NAJIBAN (Plaintiff). [26th July, 1896.]Special leave to appeal—Decrees of the High Court made on cross-appeals—Procedure.

The High Court passed a separate decree, on a cross-appeal, identical in terms with those of a decree passed on the appeal in the same suit. From the latter decree an appeal to Her Majesty in Council was then declared by the High Court to be admitted, under s. 603, Civil Procedure. But the defendant's application to have his appeal from the decree on the cross-appeal similarly admitted was refused.

The Judicial Committee was of opinion that special leave should be granted to appeal from this decree, without further security being required than had already been taken in respect of the appeal in the other.

PETITION for special leave to appeal from a decree (27th June 1891) varying a decree (23rd January 1889) of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly.

In this suit was contested the proprietary right in a share in zamindari villages and other immoveables situate in the Bareilly district. The property had been inherited by Imami, now deceased, alleged by the defendant, now petitioner, to have been his wife. The co-plaintiffs averred that they were the whole sisters of the deceased, and entitled to their shares, under Muhammadan [96] law, in her property. The defendant Ikram-ud-din alleged that the plaintiffs were half-sisters only to his late wife, who had conveyed to him two of the villages in suit, Jabira and Pachtaur. The plaintiffs had, however, made it part of their case that the defendant's marriage was invalid, and that the conveyance by his alleged wife to him was inoperative.

On the 23rd January 1889 the Subordinate Judge gave judgment in favour of the two sisters. He excepted the two villages, as to which he dismissed their claim. From his decree of that date the defendant appealed, and the plaintiffs cross-appealed to the High Court. The appeal was numbered 64, and the cross-appeal 74. On the cross-appeals the contention was, by the defendant, that the plaintiffs were half-sisters to Imami, and not entitled to the shares given by the first Court in her estate; the plaintiffs contending that the defendant had failed to prove his marriage, and that the conveyance of the two villages to him was ineffectual.

The High Court on the 27th June 1891 varied the decree. The difference between the judgments was that the first Court gave four-sevenths of the disputed estate to the plaintiffs, and the appellate Court one-half. The High Court found the plaintiffs to be half-sisters to the deceased Imami, and, finding that the defendant had been validly married to Imami, held him entitled to the other half of the estate of the deceased Imami. That estate the High Court found to include the two villages above-mentioned, which, in the Court's opinion, had not passed to the defendant by Imami's conveyance.

The decrees of the High Court, both in No. 64 and in No. 74, were in the same terms, with only the necessary variations. The defendant presented two petitions of appeal for admission of these two decrees to appeal, under ss. 598—600, Civil Procedure; and an appeal in No. 74 was admitted. As to No. 64, the petition was refused. The High Court transmitted the record of all the proceedings relating to No. 74, but omitted all papers exclusively connected with appeal No. 64, including the certified copy of the memorandum of appeal in the latter and the proceedings relating [97] to the appeal, from the decree of the High Court in No. 64, to Her Majesty in Council were also not sent.

The present petition was for special leave to appeal from the last mentioned decree, and for an order that certified copies of the necessary papers be transmitted.

Mr. H. Cowell, in support of the petition, argued that the application for special leave to appeal from decree No. 64 should be granted. The Code of Civil Procedure did not, in the chapters relating to appeals or to original decrees, authorize more than one decree being made finally disposing of the suit between cross-appellants, and to the same effect. The two decrees made in this suit should have been one, as they were mere duplicates, the one of the other. They were in effect one. One of them could not be modified without the other being in like manner varied, for there could not be two conflicting decrees in one suit, each of them final. The petitioner should have special leave to appeal from the decree in appeal No. 64, without being required to file other security beyond what he had already filed. In any event, the record should be completed.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the plaintiff-respondent, did not object to the leave being granted, provided that the papers asked for, and to be transmitted, were those already on the file of the High Court.

OPINION.

Their Lordships were of opinion that they should recommend the granting of leave applied for, without the petitioner having to file any further security than had already been taken. The record should be completed.

Where a decree grants different reliefs, as, for example, possession of land and mesne profits, it is competent to the decree-holder to execute such decree by means of separate and successive applications in respect of each relief. So held by Edge, C.J., Tyrell, Knox, Blair and Burkitt, JJ., Ram Baksh Singh v. Madat Ali (1) and Radha Kishen Lall v. Radha Pershad Sing (2) cited.

IN this case the decree-holder obtained a decree from the High Court on the 22nd June 1881, awarding him possession of certain land together with mesne profits. The decree-holder applied at various times for execution of his decree in respect of the mesne profits only, the last such application having been made on the 23rd of December 1887. On his subsequently applying for execution by possession of the land, the judgment-debtors objected that the execution of the decree in that respect was barred by limitation. This objection was allowed by the Munsif. The decree-holder then appealed to the District Judge, who reversed the Munsif's decision, holding that the effect of the various applications for execution in respect of the mesne profits had been to keep the whole decree alive. The decree-holder thereupon appealed to the High Court, and the appeal was at the instance of Mahmood and Straight, JJ., laid before the Full Bench.

Mr. D. N. Banerji, for the appellants.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—This is an appeal arising in proceedings for the execution of a decree. The appeal was referred for disposal to the Full Bench of the Court. There are four grounds stated in the memorandum of appeal. No argument has been addressed to us on behalf of the appellant in support of the first, second and fourth grounds. So far as we are concerned those grounds have not been supported. The third ground of appeal raises the question as to whether an order passed on a previous application for execution of the decree was not a bar to the present application. That ground was framed on the supposition that the order referred to decided finally that the decree had been satisfied in full. My brother Judges who are acquainted with the vernacular have considered the application upon which that order was made, and the order, and they tell me that the order related only to the application for execution in the proceedings in which it was made and that the satisfaction therein referred to applied only to the satisfaction of the money part of the decree, i.e., costs and damages. Consequently the third ground of appeal fails. There was, however, another ground not taken in the memorandum of appeal, but which was the main reason why this case was referred to the Full Bench. It has been contended that s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to proceedings in execution of decrees, and that the present application in execution of a decree for possession of the property decreed cannot be entertained by reason of the plaintiff in a prior application having applied for execution of the decree in respect only of the damages and costs decreed.

Broadly speaking, s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies a well known principle of English law. It is a section which prevents one person harassing another by bringing against him more than one suit in respect of the same cause of action. The third paragraph of the section makes an exception to the general rule dependent on leave being granted by the Court before the first hearing. It is a section which provides the rule to be followed [100] in the inception and framing of a suit by a person having claims against another in respect of one cause of action. Section 43 cannot in my opinion apply to proceedings in execution of a decree, in which the cause of action in respect of which the suit was brought has merged.

(1) N.W.P.H.C.R. (1875) 95.

(2) 18 C. 515.

It must not be assumed that I am of opinion that a plaintiff who had obtained a money-decree would be entitled to apply to have that decree executed in parts. What I mean is that it must not be assumed, in my opinion, that a plaintiff who had obtained a decree, we will say, for Rs. 1,000 would be entitled to execute it by successive applications to execute to the extent of Rs. 10, for instance, I do not say whether he would be entitled to split up the execution of his decree or not. That point can be decided when it arises. I only wish to guard myself against being misunderstood. I may say, however, that I have no doubt that a plaintiff would be entitled to make separate applications for the execution of a decree which provided for different reliefs, as, for example, where he obtained a decree for possession, and for mesne profits to be ascertained, he would in my opinion be entitled at once to execute his decree for possession and to execute on a separate and later application his decree for mesne profits when ascertained. In the case of Ram Baksh Singh v. Madat Ali, (1) Sir ROBERT STUART, C.J., and Mr. Justice PEARSON held that where a decree was of a complex character and granted different kinds of relief to be obtained by process of different kinds there was no valid objection to separate applications for partial execution of the decree. In the case of Radha Kishen Lall v. Radha Pershad Sing (2) Mr. Justice MACPHERSON and Mr. Justice AMEER ALI, held that s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to proceedings in execution of a decree, and that where a decree gave reliefs of a different character, such as a decree for possession and a decree for costs, there was nothing in the Code of Civil Procedure to prevent separate and successive applications for execution as regards each of them. I would dismiss this appeal with costs. [and order the execution to proceed].*

[101] TYRRELL, J.—I concur in all respects.

KNOX, J.—I fully agree with the learned Chief Justice, that s. 43 is not a section which governs or applies to proceedings in execution.

BLAIR, J.—I concur entirely in the order proposed and the reasons given by the learned Chief Justice.

BURKITT, J.—I also concur in the judgment of the learned Chief Justice, and I only desire to add that in my opinion, s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is a section which deals with the frame and initiatory stages of a suit, and is not applicable, after judgment and after the rights of the parties have been decided, to proceedings in execution, any more than, for example, s. 44 would be applicable. As to the case now before me, I have no doubt that the Munsif, by his order of the 23rd of December 1887, did no more than dispose of the execution application immediately before him, namely, the application for recovery of the amount of costs and damages decreed, and that his order had no effect whatever on that

*Jurisdiction—Civil and Revenue Courts—Act No. XII of 1881 (North-Western Provinces

One Nathu was an occupancy tenant. On his death his widow Jhari continued in occupation of the occupancy holding. After the death of Jhari, one Subarni, alleging herself to be the daughter of Nathu and Jhari applied in the Court of Revenue to have her name entered in the village papers as occupancy tenant of Nathu's holding in succession to him. The zamindars were [102] made parties to that proceeding. The Court of Revenue decided in favour of the applicant Subarni. The zamindars appealed on the revenue side, but their appeal was dismissed.

Held, that no suit would lie in a Civil Court on the part of the zamindars for a declaration that they and not Subarni were entitled to possession of the occupancy holding in question, and that it should be declared that Subarni was not the daughter of Nathu.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court. Pandit Sundar Lal and Munshi Gobind Prasad, for the appellants. Mr. Abdul Majid, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Court (EDGE, C. J., KNOX, BLAIR, AIKMAN and BLENNERHASSETT, JJ.) was delivered by EDGE, C. J.:—This is a suit brought by zamindars in which they claim maintenance of possession over certain biswas of land, and ask that it may be declared that after the death of one Nathu Kandhu and of his widow, Jhari, the plaintiffs as zamindars were legally in possession of the occupancy holding of Nathu Kandhu, and that the female defendant to the suit was not the daughter of Nathu Kandhu, and that the order of the Court of Revenue, declaring her to be the occupancy tenant may be declared to be ineffectual.

Nathu Kandhu was an occupancy tenant. On his death, his widow Jhari continued in occupation of the occupancy holding, and on her death the present dispute arose. The female defendant Subarni, claiming to be the daughter of Nathu by his wife Jhari, asked the Court of Revenue for possession of the occupancy holding as an occupancy tenant in succession to her parents. On that application, the Court of Revenue decided that Musammat Subarni was, as she alleged, the daughter of Nathu, and entered her name in the papers as the occupancy tenant of the holding. The zamindars, who are plaintiffs in this suit, were parties to that proceeding. Being dissatisfied with the decision of the Court of Revenue they went to the Court of Appeal on the Revenue side. Their appeal was dismissed. They then commenced a fresh campaign by filing the petition of plaint in this case in the Court [103] of the Munsif of Ghazipur. The question in this suit was exactly the question in the Revenue Court proceedings. The Munsif, coming to a different conclusion on the facts from those arrived at by both the Courts of Revenue, decreed the claim. The Subordinate Judge in appeal confirmed the decree of the Munsif. The defendants, viz., Musammat Subarni and her son, brought this appeal. It was decided by a Judge in single Bench. There was an appeal from his judgment under s. 10 of the Letters Patent to a Bench of two Judges and that appeal was referred to the Full Bench.

Now it is a fact that the application to the Court of Revenue was made by these defendants in this suit. They then sought a decision that they were occupancy tenants of the holding in succession to Nathu. On that application the Court of Revenue decided that they were. The Court of Revenue had to decide the preliminary point, first, namely, whether they had made out their pedigree, i.e., that Musammat Subarni was the daughter of Nathu, as she alleged she was, and his heir. Having found that in favour of Musammat Subarni it made the order the result of which was that the entry in the Revenue records now sought to be impugned was made.

The argument on behalf of the plaintiff has gone almost to this length. It was contended that sections such as s. 10 of Act No. XII of 1881 only apply when the position of landlord and tenant is admitted, and that a Court of Revenue has no jurisdiction finally to decide a matter under s. 10 unless the position between the parties of landlord and tenant is admitted. Precisely the same line of argument, if it was well founded, would lead to the logical conclusion that the Court of Revenue could try no suit for arrears of rent under s. 93 (a) unless the position between the parties of landlord and tenant was admitted. That would reduce the position of the Court of Revenue to the position held by arbitrators appointed by consent of parties. If the Court of Revenue could only try suits for rent, for example, or applications made under s. 10, when the relationship between the parties of [104] landlord and tenant was admitted, it would be in the power of the defendant to a suit in the Court of Revenue or of the respondent to an application in that Court to oust the jurisdiction of the Court of Revenue by simply denying the legal relation alleged to exist between him and the plaintiff. The result would be that Courts of Revenue would be Courts having jurisdiction only where the parties consented. That would be rather an extraordinary conclusion to arrive at when we bear in mind that suits under s. 93 of Act No. XII of 1881 can only come before the Civil Court in the stage of appeal, and that the jurisdiction of the Civil Court is absolutely barred, either as a Court of original jurisdiction or as a Court of appeal, in all applications to which s. 95 of that Act applies. Not only was the dispute in this case one in which an application under s. 95 of Act No. XII of 1881 might have been made, but the application of Musammat Subarni and her son was in substance an application under s. 95. It was an application which could not be granted without a determination in her favour of the question as to whether she was a tenant of the occupancy holding. In our view this question cannot be litigated in the Act No. XX of 1863, ss. 14, 15—Religious endowment—Jurisdiction—Court Fee—Act No. VII of 1870 (Court Fees Act), sch. ii, art. 17, cl. 6

Held that Act No. XX of 1863 was applicable to an endowment whereby certain shops had been purchased by subscription and dedicated to the support of a mosque, and was also applicable in respect of a person in possession of the [105] endowed property and professing to act as mutawalli even though he might not have been lawfully appointed. Dhurrum Singh v. Kissen Singh (1) and Sheoratan Kuari v. Ram Pargash (2) referred to.

Semble that a suit under s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 against the superintendent of a religious endowment for misfeasance is a suit which for the purpose of payment of court-fees falls within art. 17, cl. THIS was an appeal from an order of a District Judge returning the plaint in a suit purporting to be a suit under s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 on the ground that the Court had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit. At the hearing a preliminary objection was raised as to the sufficiency of the court-fee paid upon the plaint, which objection was overruled by the following order:—

KNOX and BLAIR, JJ.—A preliminary objection is raised to the hearing of this appeal. The objection is to the effect that the court-fee paid by the appellants in the Court below is insufficient. The suit is one brought by certain Muhammadan gentlemen in connection with a mosque called the Moti Masjid, situate in the city of Koil, of which the respondent is the mutawalli. The reliefs prayed for in the plaint are four in number, over and above the usual prayer for costs. They are as follows:—

1. That Hafiz Imam-ud-din, defendant, may be dismissed from the post of the mutawalli of the Moti Masjid under s. 15 of Act No. XX of 1863.

2. That for the management of the aforesaid appropriated property the following seven persons, viz., Khan Bahadur Kunwar Muhammad Lutf Ali Khan, Mumtaz-ud-dowlah, Nawab Muhammad Faiyaz Ali Khan, the Honorable Haji Muhammad Ismail Khan, Hafiz Maulvi Muhammad Inayat-Ullah, Khwaja Muhammad Husain, Muhammad Sarfaraz Khan and Maulvi Sbaikh Muhammad Yusuf Ali, who have been approved of by the Muhammadans of the city, may be appointed new mutawalli's (superintendents).

[106] 3. That the Moti Masjid and the whole of the appropriated property appertaining to the said Moti Masjid may be placed under the charge of the new mutawallis.

4. That for its future management a scheme according to the form annexed to this plaint or according to any other form which may be proper may be devised by the Court so that the work may be done in accordance with it.

The plaint was originally filed on a 20 rupees stamp. The suit professes to be brought under s. 15 of Act No. XX of 1863. In order to consider the merits of this preliminary objection it is best first to consider what is the nature of the action which can be brought under s. 15 of Act No. XX of 1863. Section 15 defines the interests which entitle a person to sue, and for the nature of the suit which can be brought we must look to s. 14. By that section any person interested in a mosque may sue in a Civil Court the superintendent of such mosque for any misfeasance, breach of trust or neglect of duty committed by such superintendent in respect of the trust vested in him. This is the only kind of suit specified in s. 14. That suit being laid, the action which the Civil Court may take upon the suit is next set out. In the present case the plaintiffs have not contented themselves with simply suing the superintendent for the breach of trust committed by him. They have gone on to dictate to the Court the action which that Court should take. It is important to bear this in mind. The learned vakil who made the preliminary objection based his objection upon the case of Delroos Banoo Begum v. Ashgar Ally Khan (1). That was also a suit which professed to be based upon s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863. That suit was brought not merely for the purposes set out in s. 14 of the Act. The plaintiffs claimed a share of the produce of the trust estate as an appurtenance to the office of mutawalli. They also asked that they might be made mutawallis in place of the defendant. Such a suit was clearly not one for a declaratory decree alone. In the case before us the plaintiffs, although they have burdened their plaint with [107] dictating to the Court the way in which they wished the Court to exercise its powers, have neither asked to be appointed themselves as mutawallis nor have they asked for any benefit of any kind to be awarded to them as the result of the suit. Herein is a marked difference between the case of Delroos Banoo Begum v. Ashgar Ally Khan and this case. The next case cited to us in the same behalf was the case of Sonachala v. Manika (2). There is nothing in the report which shows whether that suit was laid under the Act or Regulation prevalent in Madras which corresponds with Act No. XX of 1863. But in that case the plaintiff did not bring a suit against the trustees only for misfeasance or breach of trust but also for the removal of the defendant from management, for the appointment of the plaintiff as manager, and for the removal of certain buildings. It also was a case differing from the one before us. In reply our attention was called to several precedents to be found in the Madras series of the Indian Law Reports; but they were all precedents connected with tarwads and in no way connected with the case before us. The case of Omrao Mirza v. Jones (1) was also cited, and under that precedent the plaintiffs, who had under orders of the Court paid Court fee upon the value given by them for the purposes of jurisdiction on the several reliefs claimed by them, contended that no further Court fee need be paid and the case might, as held by the Court below, be held to be one falling under s. 7, sub-section 4, cl. (e) of Act No. VII of 1870. They did not, however, abandon the contention that the case was one which really fell under sch. ii, art. 17, cl. (vi) of the Court Fees Act (Act No. VII of 1870). The precedent Omrao Mirza v. Jones would apparently support the plaintiffs in the contention that they have in any case paid sufficient Court fees. If it were necessary in this case to decide whether the case was one which fell under sch. ii, art. 17, cl. vi of Act No. VII of 1870, we should have been inclined to hold that it does, as in our opinion a suit laid as this suit is under s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 is a suit merely against the superintendent for misfeasance. It is a suit of a [108] peculiar nature, and, so far as we can see, it is not one in which it is possible to estimate at a money value the subject-matter of the suit and is not otherwise provided for in the Court Fees Act. In any case sufficient Court fees in our opinion have been paid and the preliminary objection fails.

The appeal subsequently came on before a different Bench for disposal on the merits.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the order reported above and from the subsequent judgment on the appeal.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the appellants.

Maulvi Ghalam Mujtaba, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLENNERHASSETT, J.—This appeal has arisen in a suit against one Hafiz Imam-ud-din, who was acting, whether duly appointed or not, as the mutawalli of a mosque. The suit was filed in the Court of the District Judge. An objection, was taken that the District Judge had no jurisdiction, and he made an order returning the plaint to be presented to the proper Court. There was no question as to the local jurisdiction of the District Judge. The real question was—was the suit one to which s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 applied? The District Judge considered that that section did not apply; hence his order. The plaintiff has appealed.

For the respondent-defendant it has been contended that s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 can only apply to a mosque which has been endowed with land, and that it can only apply when it is alleged that the defendant was lawfully appointed trustee of the mosque.

The contention as to the land arises in this way. Certain Muhammadans in the city subscribed and purchased with the subscription certain shops with which the mosque was endowed. They became waqf. They are not the less waqf because they are the result of subscription and not the result of a dedication by a single owner. When the shops were purchased and dedicated to the mosque the land upon which they stood passed with them. Indeed there is nothing in the point. The contention appears to be that [109] because it is not said in the plaint that the land on which the shops stood was specially dedicated to the mosque, there was no dedication of the land.

(1) 10 C. 599.

We agree with the judgment of the High Court of Calcutta in Dhurrum Singh v. Kissen Singh (1) that s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 is generally applicable to all religious endowments of this nature. In Sheoratan Kunwari v. Ram Pargash (2) it was decided by this Court that it was not essential to bringing a suit under s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 that the endowment should ever have been taken under the Board of Revenue.

As to the other point, the defendant, although he appears to have entered upon the mutawalliship without election or specific appointment does not pretend that he is a trespasser. He does not say that he is not the mutawalli of the mosque. We find him in possession professing to be the mutawalli of the mosque, and as such s. 14 of Act No. XX of 1863 would apply to him.

The suit was properly brought in the Court of the District Judge, who alone had jurisdiction. We allow this appeal with costs. We set aside the order of the Court below with costs and direct the District Judge to receive the plaint and to enter it on the file of pending suits in his Court and to proceed with the suit according to law. The plaint, which is at present on the file in this Court, will be returned to the counsel for the appellants that it may be presented to the District Judge.

THE facts of this case are as follows :—

The child of a British Indian subject residing in Nepal, but close to the frontier, was missed, and was eventually found in company with one Ram Sundar and a woman, Musammat Anupa, at Basti, in the Gorakhpur district.

The case was inquired into by a Magistrate at Basti, but without the certificate required by s. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, having been obtained from the Political Agent in Nepal.

According to the Magistrate who inquired into the case, there was no direct evidence as to whether the kidnapping actually took place in Nepal territory, though the presumption was that it occurred in Nepal.

EDGE, C. J. and BLENNERHASSETT, J.—The offence of kidnapping for which Ram Sundar and Musaminat Anupa have been committed for trial took place in Nepal. The charge was inquired into by a Magistrate in British India, and the commitment for an offence under s. 363 of the Indian Penal Code was made, but no certificate of the Political Agent in Nepal, which is required by the provisions of s. 188 of the Code of Criminal Procedure as a condition precedent to the hearing of the charge in British India, was produced or is shown to have been issued. The proviso to s. 188 is prohibitive, and under the circumstances, we hold that the Magistrate had no jurisdiction. We quash the commitment.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an application to the High Court to act under s. 185 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The case against the applicant is one of an offence alleged to have been [112] committed by him under s. 408 of the Indian Penal Code. The contention on his behalf is that, if he committed any offence, it was committed in Lower Bengal and not within the Magistrate's jurisdiction at Cawnpore. Of course I express no opinion whatever as to whether the applicant committed an offence at all. That matter has yet to be decided. If, however, he parted with goods of his employers in Lower Bengal and did not remit the price of those goods, as he was bound to do, to his employers in Cawnpore, it appears to me that the case comes within s. 179 of the Code of Criminal Procedure; that the consequence of the applicant having made away with, for his own purposes, goods of his employers in Lower Bengal, or the price of them, if he did so, was that a loss of the value of those goods ensued to his employers in Cawnpore. It might be very difficult to prove where the actual offence of breach of trust was committed. Of course, the applicant denies he has committed any. At one time he said the goods were on their way to Cawnpore. Another time he said the goods were at Lucknow. The goods have disappeared. The applicant went to Cawnpore and failed to account. The matter can be inquired into at Cawnpore, and the Magistrate at Cawnpore has jurisdiction in the case. I dismiss the application.

As to the charge relating to the coal, I have not sufficient facts before me to decide whether the Magistrate has jurisdiction to inquire or not.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—The applicants were convicted by the Joint Magistrate of Dehra Dun, of an offence punishable under s. 411 of the Indian Penal Code. Four of them were sentenced to be fined Rs. 40, and the remaining two to fines of Rs. 20 each, or, in default, to undergo one month's rigorous imprisonment. By his order, the Joint Magistrate directed that, out of the total sum of Rs. 200 imposed as fine, Rs. 100 should, under the provisions of s. 545 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, be paid to Mani Ram, the complainant in the case, as compensation. The fines were paid, and, the case not being an appealable one, Rs. 100 were at once paid to the complainant. The six accused persons applied to this Court for revision of the Joint Magistrate's order. A Bench of this Court, consisting of the learned Chief Justice and my brother Banerji, set aside the convictions and sentences imposed upon the applicants, and further directed that the fines, if paid, be refunded. When the applicants applied to the Magistrate for the refund of the fines in compliance with the order of this Court, the sum of Rs. 100 was repaid to them. As regards the balance of Rs. 100 they were directed to sue the complainant Mani Ram in the Civil Court.

The applicants come here asking for the revision of this order. In my opinion the order of this Court directing that the fines which the applicants paid should be repaid to them implies an order that the fines, in whose-soever hands they might be, should be payable to them. In my opinion the provisions of s. 547 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are wide enough to cover a case like the present. I see no reason why the applicants should be driven to have recourse to a civil suit against the complainant Mani Ram in order [114] that the direction of this Court as to the repayment of the fines should be given effect to. It is doubtful even whether in a Civil Court they would have any remedy against Mani Ram, as it was from the Magistrate and not from the applicants, that Mani Ram received the money. I set aside the Magistrate's order and direct him to call upon Mani Ram to refund the applicants' money which was paid to him. If he refuses, the Magistrate will take action in the manner directed in s. 547 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and, when the money had been recovered, if it is recovered, will repay it to the applicants.

Jurisdiction—Transfer of Magistrate—Order passed by a Magistrate after his successor had entered upon his appointment—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 12.

By an order of the Local Government Babu Dila Ram, a Magistrate exercising jurisdiction in the Meerut district, was transferred from that district "on the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad."

Held, by Banerji, J., that the effect of the order of transfer so expressed was that Babu Dila Ram ceased to have jurisdiction as a magistrate within the Meerut district from the time when Kunwar Kamta Prasad commenced work as a magistrate in that district.

Held, by Aikman, J., that the effect of the said order was that Babu Dila Ram ceased to have jurisdiction on the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad; but whether such arrival was his arrival within the limits of the district or at headquarters was not clear from the order.

Empress of India v. Anand Sarup (1) referred to.

THIS was a reference under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure made by the Sessions Judge of Meerut. The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of Banerji, J.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI, J.—This case has been referred by the learned Sessions Judge of Meerut, under the following circumstances. On the 9th of June 1896, Babu Dila Ram, a magistrate of the first class, granted sanction under section 495 of the Code of Criminal [115] Procedure, 1882, for the prosecution of Balwant and Tika for offences punishable under ss. 211 and 193 of the Indian Penal Code. It was contended on behalf of Balwant and Tika that Babu Dila Ram had ceased to have jurisdiction in the district of Meerut, on the date above mentioned, and was not competent to make the order of sanction. By notification of Government dated the 7th of May, 1896, Babu Dila Ram was transferred from Meerut to Ballia, "on the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad." I presume that this must be taken to mean—on the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad in Meerut, and the assumption by him of the office of Deputy Collector in that district. We have no information as to the date of the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad at Meerut, but he took over charge of his duties on the 26th of May, 1896, a fortnight before the date on which Babu Dila Ram passed the order complained of. The question which arises in this case is whether, after the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad at Meerut and the assumption by him of the charge of his duties as magistrate, Babu Dila Ram ceased to have any jurisdiction in the district of Meerut. By s. 12 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the Local Government may from time to time define local areas within which a magistrate may exercise all or any of the powers with which he may be invested. Babu Dila Ram's competency to exercise his powers as a magistrate in the district of Meerut, was derived from the order of the Local Government posting him as a magistrate to that district. His jurisdiction to exercise his powers in the district ceased as soon as the order for his transfer to another district came into effect. The notification of Government to which I have referred declared that Babu Dila Ram was to be regarded as transferred from Meerut to Ballia on the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad. In my opinion that notification should be read with the notification which precedes it, viz., that Kunwar Kamta Prasad was to be posted "on return from leave" to the Meerut district; and, placing a reasonable construction on the notification relating to the transfer of Babu Dila Ram, I am of opinion that the words "on arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad" in that notification should be construed [116] to mean—on the assumption by Kunwar Kamta Prasad of his duties as magistrate. The continuance of Babu Dila Ram to exercise his powers in the Meerut district depended, according to the notification of Government, upon the happening of a particular event, namely, the assumption of his duties by Kunwar Kamta Prasad. Babu Dila Ram, therefore, ceased to have jurisdiction in the Meerut district from the 26th of May, on which date Kunwar Kamta Prasad took over charge of his duties. From that date he could exercise no jurisdiction in the Meerut district as a magistrate. This case is within the principle of the ruling of the Full Bench in Empress of India v. Anand Sarup (1). In that case it was held that Mr. Mulock ceased to retain his jurisdiction as a magistrate in the district of Meerut on being relieved by Mr. Fisher. That was the case of a District Magistrate who held a specific office and who ceased to hold that office as soon as he was relieved of his duties by another officer. The case of a Deputy Collector exercising the powers of a magistrate is no doubt different. Any number of such officers may be appointed by Government to a particular district, and the assumption of the office of Deputy Collector by one officer in a district does not necessarily lead to the result that another Deputy Collector who has been performing the duties of a magistrate in that district ceases to have jurisdiction in the district. The jurisdiction of each officer within a specific area depends, as I have said, upon the orders of Government appointing him to exercise jurisdiction within that area. In this case the notification of Government to which I have referred, worded as it was, had the effect of transferring Babu Dila Ram from the Meerut district as soon as Kunwar Kamta Prasad took over charge of his duties in that district, and he no longer continued to be a magistrate in the Meerut district. That being so, he had no jurisdiction on the 9th of June, 1896, to make the order complained of. Had the notification of Government transferring Babu Dila Ram from Meerut not been worded in the way in which it was worded, and had it been to the effect that [117] Babu Dila Ram was to be transferred from Meerut to Ballia on being relieved of his duties in the Meerut district, I should have had no hesitation in holding that he had jurisdiction to make his order of the 9th of June, as he was not relieved of his duties in the Meerut district until that date. Such a notification would have attained the object contemplated in the letter of Government dated the 23rd April 1896, to which the learned Public Prosecutor drew our attention. Having regard, however, to the terms in which the order for the transfer of Babu Dila Ram was made, I must hold that he ceased to have jurisdiction in Meerut as soon as Kunwar Kamta Prasad assumed charge of his duties in that district. I would set aside the order made by Babu Dila Ram on the 9th June 1896.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur with my brother Banerji in thinking that the order made by Babu Dila Ram on the 9th of June 1896 was without jurisdiction and must be set aside. I consider that we must be guided in this case by the principle laid down in the decision by the majority of this Court in the Full Bench case, Empress of India v. Anand Sarup (1). In that case the Government notification appointed Mr. Mulock, who was then officiating Magistrate and Collector of Meerut, to officiate as Magistrate and Collector of Gorakhpur on the happening of a certain event i. e., on his being relieved by Mr. Fisher. It was held in that decision that on the happening of that event Mr. Mulock ceased to exercise any jurisdiction in the Meerut district. In the present case the effect of the Government notification is to declare that Babu Dila Ram on the happening of a certain event ceased to have any jurisdiction in the Meerut district. If that event happened before the order in this case was made, that order was made by a magistrate who had no jurisdiction to make it. The event in this case, the happening of which determined the jurisdiction of Babu Dila Ram in the Meerut district, was the arrival of another magistrate named Kunwar Kamta Prasad. That arrival had undoubtedly taken place two weeks before the order complained of was [118] passed. I feel bound to express my opinion that the form of the order of transfer is open to objection. It is not clear whether the arrival was the arrival within the Meerut district or the arrival at the headquarters of that district. In either case the exact time of the arrival might be unknown to the officer whose transfer depended upon it, and he might in consequence pass an order when his jurisdiction had ceased. The learned Public Prosecutor endeavoured to support the order on two grounds. The first ground was that the notification of Babu Dila Ram's transfer referred to him only as Deputy Collector and did not refer to him as Magistrate. He therefore contended that, notwithstanding this notification and the arrival of Kunwar Kamta Prasad, Babu Dila Ram might still be able to exercise jurisdiction as magistrate. In my opinion this contention is untenable. Babu Dila Ram was invested with powers of a magistrate and these powers are exercised by him in any district to which he may be posted. Even if the contention could be sustained, it lands us in a worse dilemma, for it would follow that Babu Dila Ram is still a magistrate of the Meerut district and all the orders passed by him as magistrate in the Ballia district would be without jurisdiction. The next ground on which the learned Public Prosecutor endeavoured to support the order was a letter of Government No. 1007 dated the 23rd of April 1896. In paragraph 3 of this letter it is directed that in the case of transfers Magistrates and Deputy Commissioners should examine the files of any subordinate whose transfer is impending and arrange so that the officer shall so far as possible clear his file before making over charge of his office. With the object which the Government had in view in issuing this letter I most cordially sympathise. There is no doubt that the departure of a magistrate either on leave or transfer leaving cases partially heard results not only in great delay in the disposal of cases but in additional expense and inconvenience to the parties. By cl. (a) of s. 350 of the Code of Criminal Procedure an accused is entitled when a magistrate takes up a case partially heard by his predecessor to demand that the witnesses be resummoned and reheard. If the design of Government in the letter referred to [119] be carried out, it would obviate the delay and expense which arise from the exercise of the privilege thus given to the accused by law. But the power of a District Magistrate to allocate work is confined to the allocation of work amongst magistrates who are for the time being his subordinates. If the effect of a Government order is to transfer a Magistrate from a district, the District Magistrate of that district has no longer any authority to make any arrangement in regard to the work of the magistrate so transferred. Whilst there can only be one District Magistrate, the number of other magistrates in a district is only limited by the discretion of the Local Government, inasmuch as it may appoint as many persons as it thinks fit, besides the District Magistrate, to be Magistrates in a district. There would be a difficulty in providing that any magistrate subordinate to the District Magistrate should be transferred on his making over charge of his office inasmuch as there is no particular office of which he can make over charge. If, as suggested by my brother Banerji, the notification of Government were to run—"on being relieved of his duties"—the difficulty would, I think, be obviated, and the object which the Local Government had in view in issuing the letter of the 23rd of April 1896, would be capable of being attained. I concur in thinking that the order made by Babu Dila Ram on the 9th of June must be quashed.

BY THE COURT.

The order of the Court is that the order of Babu Dila Ram, dated the 9th of June 1896, is set aside.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. BHADU.* [10th November, 1896.]

Practice—Pleading—Qualified plea of guilty—Evidence to be taken.

In capital cases where there is any doubt as to whether an accused person fully understands the meaning and effect of a plea of guilty it is advisable for the Court to take evidence and not to convict solely on the plea of the accused.

[120] THE facts of this case were as follows:—

The appellant Bhadu was a young man of about 20 years of age who had a wife about the same age as or a little older than himself. (The Civil Surgeon in the report of his post mortem examination states that "the body was that of a well developed woman aged about 22 years.") The wife had been living in her father's house, and refused to live with Bhadu: Bhadu at last came himself to fetch her, but his wife declined to return with him. According to Bhadu's own statement made before the Magistrate, she refused to go and then said to him:—"Chal ware, tum kahan rahe?" On this Bhadu got angry and struck his wife with a kulhari, inflicting wounds which resulted in her death. At his trial in the Court of Session Bhadu pleaded:—"I killed my wife. She abused me. Called me ware. No one was present. I killed her with a kulhari." On this plea, as on a plea of guilty, Bhadu was convicted without evidence being taken. He appealed to the High Court.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. F. Chamier), for the Crown.

* Criminal Appeal No. 1078 of 1896.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLENNERHASSETT, J.—Bhadu was convicted on his own plea without evidence being recorded in the Sessions Court. He was charged with the offence punishable under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code. The case against him was that he had murdered his wife. His plea as recorded is as follows:—"Guilty. I killed my wife. She had abused me. Called me 'ware.' No one was present. I killed her with a kulhari." We are not clear whether the word "guilty" in the plea was Bhadu's or was the interpretation of the Judge of the meaning of Bhadu's plea. In any event it was not an unqualified plea of guilty; and although the words of abuse which Bhadu said had been used might not have effect to take the case out of s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code, they put a qualification on his admission and made it necessary in our opinion that the trial should proceed and evidence should be taken. In this country it is dangerous to assume that a prisoner of this class understands what are the ingredients of the offence under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code, and what are [121] the matters which might reduce the act committed to an offence under s. 304. Even in England it used to be the practice of some judges, and probably is still, although they were not bound to do so, to advise persons pleading guilty to a capital offence to plead not guilty and stand their trial. One of us has known that course followed in numerous cases. We set aside the conviction and sentence, and send this case back to the Court of Session with a direction to the Judge to take the evidence in the case and proceed on the basis of the plea not being an unqualified plea of guilty.

[The case was subsequently tried on evidence taken before the same Sessions Judge, and Bhadu was again convicted and sentenced to death, the conviction and sentence being upheld by the High Court on the 4th of February 1897.]

s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to the High Court this second order of the [122] 21st of August was set aside on the ground that the Assistant Collector had no further jurisdiction to deal with the matter. On the 1st of June 1896, the said Assistant Collector being at that time officiating Collector of the District, application was again made to him to sanction the prosecution of Shankar Dial in respect of the matter above referred to. On the 8th of June 1896 the Officiating Collector of the district passed an order declining to interfere and referring the applicant to the High Court for orders. The applicant, however, took this order before the Sessions Judge, who, on the 19th of September 1896, made an order sanctioning the prosecution of Shankar Dial. Shankar Dial accordingly applied to the High Court under s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for revocation of the sanction granted by the Sessions Judge.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—Shankar Dial, in a suit in a Court of Revenue made use of a document which is alleged to have been forged. An Assistant Collector of the first class who was trying the case refused to sanction the prosecution of Shankar Dial. However, the same Assistant Collector, at a subsequent date, having changed his mind assumed jurisdiction and granted sanction. He granted the sanction on the 21st of August 1895. On an application in revision in this Court the order granting sanction was set aside on the ground that the Assistant Collector of the first class had, by his refusal of the 1st of August 1895, exhausted his jurisdiction to interfere in the matter. The order of the High Court was passed on the 16th of December 1895. The applicant, who was desirous of bringing Shankar Dial to justice, waited until the 1st of June 1896, when the officer who had been the Assistant Collector of the first class was acting as Collector of the district, and then applied to him for sanction. He declined to interfere, and referred her to the High Court for orders. The lady, however, applied to the District Judge, who, on the 19th of September 1896, made an [123] order sanctioning the prosecution of Shankar Dial. Shankar Dial had now applied to this Court to exercise its revisional powers and set aside the order of the District Judge.

The application is based upon two grounds—the one, that the Court of the District Judge is not the Court to which appeals ordinarily lie from the Court of an Assistant Collector, and the other, on the merits of the application itself.

As to the first ground, that depends upon the construction to be put upon the penultimate paragraph of s. 195 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. That paragraph is as follows:—"For the purpose of this section every Court, other than a Court of Small Causes shall be deemed subordinate only to the Court to which appeals from the former Court ordinarily lie." That paragraph does not mean to give the jurisdiction to the Court to which the appeal in the matter in which the false document was used happened to lie. If that construction was put on the paragraph, it might happen that there would be no Court which could exercise the power of revoking or granting sanction which had been given or refused by the Lower Court, as no appeal might lie in the particular case in which the perjury was committed or the false document used. It is impossible to say what the Legislature intended by that penultimate paragraph. To take the case of an Assistant Collector of the first class. Where an appeal would lie from his decision would depend upon the nature of the matter before him. The appeal might lie to the District Judge, to the Collector of the District or to the Commissioner of the Division. There are some cases in which no appeal would lie at all. As remarked by me in a somewhat similar case—Hari Prasad v. Debi Dial (1)—“ I doubt whether the framers of s. 195 of Act No. X of 1882 had present to their minds the difficulty or ambiguity in this respect arising out of the provisions of the Rent Act, XII of 1881.” (That is, Act No. XII of 1881). I might add that a similar difficulty might arise in deciding whether the High Court or the Court of the District Judge is the Court to which appeals ordinarily [124] lie from the Court of the Subordinate Judge. The Legislature has placed the Courts in a most difficult position. It is impossible, in my opinion, for a Judge to give any satisfactory reason for holding in this case that the Court of the District Judge was the Court which had jurisdiction, and that the Collector would not have had jurisdiction and yet it was not intended by the Legislature that two Courts should have concurrent jurisdiction, or that the matter should be left in doubt. For reasons of convenience I am of opinion that we should apply the principal of decision of this Court in Hari Prasad v. Debi Dial (1). If that decision had been present to my mind or had been brought to my attention in the case of Queen-Empress v. Ajudhia Prasad (2), I should have followed it. I candidly confess that it is impossible for me to say which of these decisions is right. It is for the Legislature to say that, and by enactment to interpret s. 195 of the Code of Civil Procedure. I would hold accordingly that the District Judge had jurisdiction to make the order sanctioning the prosecution in this case.

So much for the legal aspect of the case. As to the merits, it is obvious that this lady, in making these different applications and allowing months to elapse before bringing the matter to a conclusion, was actuated, not by a desire to further the interests of justice, but by a desire to oppress her opponent through the action of the Criminal Courts. There has been no explanation given of the delay between the 16th of December 1895 and June 1896. I would allow the application on the merits and would revoke the sanction to prosecute which has been granted.

BANERJI, J.—I agree in the order proposed by the learned Chief Justice and in his reasons for holding that the District Judge had jurisdiction to make the order complained of.

AIKMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion as the learned Chief Justice and concur in all that he has said.

BY THE COURT—The order of the Court is that the application is allowed and the sanction is revoked.

It does not follow that because a person has assets of a nominal value in excess of his liabilities he is not entitled to be declared an insolvent. But where a person applies to be declared an insolvent and shows in his statement that his assets exceed his liabilities, he must show also that by the sale of his interests or other realization of his assets a sum would not be secured which would enable him to pay his debts in full. *Jowalla Nath v. JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BURKITT, J.—Baldeo Das, a judgment-debtor arrested in execution of a decree against him, applied under s. 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be declared an insolvent. The applicant filed a schedule of his assets and liabilities, and it is not suggested that he had done anything which, under s. 351 of the Code, would be a bar to a declaration of his insolvency being made. However, the schedule of assets and liabilities showed this, that the applicant had assets of the value of over Rs. 12,000, and his liabilities amounted to a little over 6,000. It is true that much of the assets consisted of moneys lent upon mortgages or shares in sums of money lent upon mortgages, but he had also zamindari and some other assets. He filed no statement containing an estimate of the present realizable value of his assets; and, for all we know from this record, the sale of his zamindari and of his mortgagee interests under the mortgages might realize more, and that promptly, than would enable him to pay his debts in full. [126] The Court below dismissed his application and he has brought this appeal.

The decision of the High Court at Calcutta in Jowalla Nath v. Parbatty Bibi (1) has been pressed upon us on behalf of the appellant. Now we entirely agree with what is said in that judgment that "it is quite an error to suppose that a man is not entitled to be declared an insolvent because the sum total of his assets is larger than the sum total of his debts. It may well be, and is frequently the case, that a man's securities are locked up and are not available at the time he is called upon to pay his debts; but he is none the less entitled to be declared an insolvent, unless he is found guilty of dishonest conduct." It is obvious that a man may have assets of the nominal value of Rs. 20,000 and liabilities amounting to no more than Rs. 6,000, and yet at the time he may be insolvent, that is, unable to pay his debts in full. His assets might be unrealizable, except at such a sacrifice as would leave the proceeds insufficient for the payment of his debts. In such a case the man would be an insolvent. But in our opinion where a man applies to be declared an insolvent and shows in his statement that his assets exceed his liabilities, he must go further and show that by sale of his interests, or other realization of his assets, a sum would not be secured which would enable him to pay his debts in full. That the applicant has not done in this case. The onus was on him. We entirely dissent from that portion of the judgment in the Calcutta case in which it is said that the Judge "could not refuse to declare the applicant an insolvent unless he found affirmatively that the applicant had brought himself within what I may call the penal clauses of s. 351." If the law were as put in the sentence which we have quoted, it would apparently be immaterial whether the man who applied under s. 344 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be declared an insolvent was actually insolvent or was capable of paying his debts ten times over. The truth is that the chapter in question, namely, Chapter XX of the Code of Civil Procedure, in which these [127] sections occur, is a chapter dealing with "insolvent judgment-debtors," that is, with judgment-debtors who are incapable of paying their debts at the time. The chapter does not apply to a judgment-debtor who is not insolvent. Insolvency is what lies at the root of all the provisions of the chapter. In the present case the applicant apparently desires by a declaration of insolvency to appoint the Court his agent to collect his debts and to escape the worry of having to do it for himself. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA IN COUNCIL (Defendant) v.
MAHADEI (Plaintiff) v. SHIAM LAL AND OTHERS (Defendants).^{*}
[1st December, 1896.]

Act No. XIX of 1873 (N.-W.P. Land Revenue Act), s. 241—Jurisdiction—Civil and Revenue Courts—Suit to recover moveable property sold on account of an arrear of revenue due by a person other than the owner of the property.

Where in satisfaction of an arrear of revenue due by certain defaulters some cattle belonging to another person, who had no concern with the land in respect of which the arrear was due, were sold, it was held that the remedy of the owner of the cattle lay entirely in the Courts of Revenue and that no suit would lie in a Civil Court respecting such sale.

[Appr., 5 O.C. 228 (280); F., A.W.N. (1905), 237.]

THE plaintiff brought her suit in the Court of a Munsif against the Secretary of State, defendant first party, Shiam Lal and Piari Lal, defendants second party, and Baijnath and Harcharan Das, defendants third party, on the allegation that certain immoveable property belonging to her, namely, some cattle and a cart, had been wrongfully sold by the tahsil officials in order to realize an arrear of revenue which was not due by her, but by the defendants second party, and had been purchased by the defendants third party. She prayed that the sale might be set aside, and claimed restoration of the property or its value.

The defendant first party pleaded that the suit was not cognizable by a Civil Court, and that the property sold in fact belonged to the defendants second party. The defendants second party [128] pleaded the same defence. Of the defendants third party only one appeared, and he pleaded that the property had been purchased in good faith at a public sale.

The Court of first instance, (Munsif of Sambhal) held that, by reason of s. 241 of Act No. XIX of 1873, it had no jurisdiction to entertain the suit, and dismissed it.

The plaintiff appealed, and the Lower Appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Moradabad), holding that the jurisdiction of the Civil Courts was not ousted, decreed the appeal and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From this order of remand the defendant first party appealed to the High Court.

The Standing Counsel (Mr. E. Chamier), for the appellant.

Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—This appeal has arisen in a suit which was brought to recover certain moveable property, alleged to belong to the plaintiff, which had been sold for an arrear of revenue due by some of the defendants, or for the value of the property, and to have the sale set aside. The first Court dismissed the suit on the ground that the jurisdiction of the Civil Court was barred by s. 241 of Act No. XIX of 1873. The Lower Appellate Court, taking a different view of the law, set aside the decision of the first Court and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order one of the defendants, the Secretary of State for India in Council, has appealed.

It seems a hardship that a person whose cattle, or other moveable property, have been sold for an arrear of land revenue due by another person, and in respect of land with which the owner of the moveable property is not concerned, should be debarred of his right of suit in a Civil Court and should be left to such proceedings by appeal or otherwise as may be opened to him in the Courts of Revenue. However, we cannot decide this case on questions of hardship. We have to decide it according to the construction of the Statute. This clearly was a claim not only connected with, but [129] arising out of, a process enforced on account of an arrear of revenue. The sale which it is claimed to set aside was a sale for arrears of revenue, and the claim was one within s. 181 of Act No. XIX of 1873. The claim in this case consequently falls within either cl. (i) or cl. (j) of s. 241 of Act No. XIX of 1873. There is nothing in either of those clauses to suggest that the exclusion of jurisdiction is limited to claims made by the person who is actually in default in payment of his land revenue. It appears to have been the intention of the Legislature to reserve to the jurisdiction of Courts of Revenue all such claims. We find on referring to Act No. XII of 1881, in the somewhat analogous case of an illegal distress for rent, that the suit of the person injured, although the distrainer may have acted fraudulently and without title, is by the operation of ss. 87 and 93 of that Act reserved exclusively for the jurisdiction of Courts of Revenue.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the decree of the first Court was right. We set aside the order of the Lower Appellate Court remanding the suit, and we restore the decree of the first Court. The suit will stand dismissed with costs in all Courts.

ONE Muhammad Ali Khan applied for a certificate under Act No. VII of 1889 for the collection of his share, amounting to Rs. 1,50,000, of the dower debt of Rs. 11,00,000 of his deceased daughter. The debt was to be collected from Aijaz Wali Khan, the [130] husband of the deceased lady. The application was resisted on behalf of the minor children of the lady in respect of whose dower the claim was made on the ground that a certificate for collection of part only of the debt could not be given, and that the applicant ought to apply for a certificate to collect the whole of the dower debt, giving security for the due application of the shares of the other persons entitled. The Lower Court (District Judge of Bareilly) dismissed the application, holding that the Court could not grant a certificate for partial collection of a debt. From this order the applicant appealed to the High Court.

Mr. Conlan and Pandit Moti Lal, for the appellant.

Mr. D. N. Banerji and Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—A Muhammadan lady, who was entitled to something more than eleven lakhs of rupees as her dower, died. Her husband appears to have discharged that portion of the dower debt which was inherited by his son by the transfer of some property. The husband also inherited a portion of the dower debt. The father of the deceased lady has brought a suit against the husband of the deceased lady to recover his share, i.e., the father's share, which he took by inheritance to his daughter in the dower debt. He had applied for a certificate entitling him to collect debts to the amount of Rs. 1,50,000. It was necessary under s. 4 of Act No. VII of 1889 that he should have a certificate. The Judge declined to grant such certificate unless the applicant paid the 2 per cent. duty on the whole debt, i.e., the debt of eleven lakhs odd, which was due to the Muhammadan lady. There has been a uniform series of decisions in this Court according to which a certificate cannot be granted to collect a part only of a debt. There is no decision of this Court, or, so far as we know, of any other Court, which says that an applicant for a certificate, either under the present Act or under the former Acts, must apply for a certificate, to collect all the debts due to the deceased. We think it would be against public policy that a certificate to collect part only of a debt should be granted, as it would tend to multiplication possibly of suits in respect of one [131] liability and the harassment of debtors; but it appears to us to be contemplated by the Act that a certificate may be granted for the collection of any one debt, or of more debts than one, without obtaining a certificate for the collection of all the debts due to the deceased.

It appears to us that the applicant must pay the duty for a certificate entitling him to collect the whole of the dower debt which at the date of the application was due and payable. In calculating what the amount of that debt was, the son's share by inheritance, which has been discharged, and the husband's share which he holds in his own hands in satisfaction of his own share in the inheritance, will be deducted, and the duty will be payable on the balance. To that extent we allow this appeal, but without costs.

NATHU WILSON (Petitioner) v. C. H. MCAFEE AND ANOTHER
(Opposite Parties).^{*} [3rd December, 1896.]

Act. No. II of 1882 (Indian Trusts Act) ss. 55, 60, 61, 74—Order dismissing application for removal of a trustee—Civil Procedure Code, s. 2—Decree—Appeal.

No appeal will lie from an order dismissing an application for the removal of a trustee, such order not being a "decree" within the meaning of s. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and not being otherwise appealable.

IN this case, one Nathu Wilson, claiming as sole legatee under the will of his mother, applied to the District Judge of Saharanpur for the removal of the trustees appointed for the carrying out of the provisions of his mother's will. The applicant alleged that one of the trustees, by name McAfee, who was an executor under and had proved the will, had, after mismanaging the property for a time, informally renounced his executorship without rendering accounts. Upon this the Court had, on the motion of the applicant, appointed, under s. 74 of the Indian Trusts Act, a pleader of Dehra Dun, of the name of Morton, to carry out the provisions of the will. The applicant went on to allege that the trustee so [132] appointed had been guilty of various acts inconsistent with the proper discharge of his duties as trustee, by reason of which the applicant had suffered injury, and he prayed that "the Court may take charge of the property mentioned in the will under s. 60 of Act No. II of 1882 and protect it from injury and administer it through some able and reliable person," and that an injunction might issue to the trustee in possession restraining him from interference with the property in question.

On this application, the District Judge, after considering the allegations made against the acting trustee, found that no acts amounting to a breach of trust had been proved against him, and that no reason existed for removing him from his office, and accordingly dismissed the application.

The applicant appealed to the High Court.

Mr. D. N. Banerji and Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the applicant.

Mr. A. E. Ryves, for the respondent Morton.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—This is an appeal from an order under the Indian Trusts Act, 1882 (Act No. II of 1882), refusing to remove a trustee. Mr. Ryves has objected that no appeal lay. Mr. Banerji contends that the order was a decree, as that word is defined in s. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure. So far as we are aware, this point has never been decided. The case of Mohima Chunder Biswas v. Tarini Sunker Ghose (1) is not of much assistance, as in that case Act No. VIII of 1890 which was the Act in question, did provide for appeals in certain cases. We think it would be stretching the definition of "decree" in s. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure to hold that it included a refusal to dismiss a trustee. We are of opinion that the appeal did not lie, and we dismiss it with costs.

JANKI (Defendant) v. BHAIRON AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs).^{*}
[9th December, 1896.]

Hindu Law—Interpretation of document—Will—Intention of testator—Devise to wife—Widow's estate—Stridhan.

One Debi Din, a separated sonless Hindu, made a will in favour of his wife of which the material clause was as follows:—"After my death the said Musammatt * * * is to be the person in possession and ownership in place of me, the executant of all the bequeathed property aforesaid by right of this will." Debi Din died leaving a widow and a daughter who was married to one Janki. The widow obtained possession of the property dealt with by the will on the death of Debi Din. The daughter died in the lifetime of the widow, who thereupon made a will leaving the property which had come to her from Debi Din to Janki. On the death of the widow certain persons alleging themselves to be the nearest reversioners to Debi Din claimed the property.

Held that, on the wording of the will and having regard to the surrounding circumstances of the case, the testator having no near male heirs, and the plaintiffs, if reversioners at all, being remote reversioners, the intention of the testator, Debi Din, was to leave the property in question to his widow as her stridhan, to descend to her heirs. *Koonjbehari Dhur v. JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—Debi Din made a will by which he bequeathed all his property to Musammatt Lachminia. She was his wife. By this will, he said:—"After my death the said Musammatt is to be the person in possession and ownership in place of me, the executant, of all the bequeathed property aforesaid by right of this will." We need not refer to the rest of the will. Debi Din died. He was sonless, but he left his widow and a daughter surviving him. The daughter was married to Janki, the defendant in this case. She had no sons by Janki; but she had daughters, who are still living. The [134] daughter died in her mother's lifetime, and thereupon Lachminia made a will in favor of Janki. After the death of Lachminia, the plaintiffs, claiming to be reversioners of Debi Din, brought the present suit against Janki claiming to have him ejected and to get possession of the property. There is no doubt that Debi Din was a separated Hindu. There is equally no doubt that he had no male relation of near kinship. These plaintiffs, if they were related to him at all, and were reversioners, were distant. The first Court held that the property passed under the will to Lachminia as her stridhan and that on her death her heirs became entitled to it, and consequently dismissed the plaintiffs' suit, the plaintiffs not being heirs to Lachminia. The Court of first appeal construed the will as a gift to Lachminia of nothing more than she would have taken if her husband Debi Din had died without a will, and, setting aside the order of the first Court, made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order of remand this appeal has been brought.

It is contended on behalf of the respondents that, the will not containing any words to show that Debi Din intended that Lachminia should take an estate of inheritance which she could alienate of her own free will, the will gave her nothing beyond what she would have taken had there been no will. In support of that view Mr. Baldeo Ram has cited to us several cases, amongst them the case of Kunjbehari Dhur v. Premchand Dutt (3). It appears to us that if the learned Judges in that case intended their view of the law to be of general application, it would be impossible for a husband ever to make a gift of immovable property to his wife which would become her stridhan, unless he gave her the power of alienation, which we do not conceive to be a correct view of the Hindu law on this subject.

Another case to which Mr. Baldeo Ram referred to us was Moulvie Mahomed Shumsool Hooda v. Shewuk Ram (1). In that case their Lordships of the Privy Council had not to decide the point before us, and indeed did not decide it. Another case [135] cited to us was Hira Bai v. Lakshmi Bai (2). It is obvious from that case that the point before the Judges was really whether the gift was one of an estate of inheritance which could be alienated, or merely the gift of a Hindu widow's life estate. In the case before us it is obvious that Debi Din did not intend to confer upon his wife a power of alienation. Neither would he in law have intended to confer upon her a power of alienation if he had expressly given this property to her as her stridhan without adding a power to alienate. The result would have been that she could not have alienated. That may be gathered from page 762 of Mayne's Hindu Law and Usage (5th edition).

(1) 2 I. A. 7.

(2) 11 B. 573.

(3) 5 C. 684.

The question which we have to decide is—what was his intention? Did he intend that this property should be her stridhan, with the result as a matter of law that upon her death it would go to her heirs, or did he intend merely to give her that interest in the property which she would have had if he had died without making a will at all? No doubt cases do arise in which, owing to the disputes as to the property or as to the legal position of an alleged adopted son or of a widow whose husband claimed to be separate, wills are made, which, if the husband was separate or the alleged adopted son was really an adopted son, would be unnecessary. In every case, first the language of the will, and then the surrounding circumstances have to be looked at, in case the language is doubtful. Now in this case the language which was used in the will was consistent with a gift of stridhan or with the mere formality of making a gift of a life interest which would have devolved upon Lachminia, whether the will was made or not. There are no circumstances shown to have been existing at or before the date of the will which suggest that, if Debi Din had died without a will, Musammatt Lachminia's right to enjoy the property as a Hindu widow for her life would have been challenged by anyone. Consequently there was no reason for Debi Din making a will to be used in a dispute which no one suggests was likely to arise. It was reasonable under the circumstances, even from a [136] Hindu point of view, there being no near kinsmen, and but the plaintiffs, who were doubtful reversioners, that Debi Din should make such a will, the effect of which would be to secure his property to his own descendants, though in the female line, and to secure it, as he probably hoped, without any objections being raised by questionable reversioners. The wisdom of his making a will is apparent from the present suit; for here are people coming forward to claim as reversioners as to whose position as reversioners there may be some doubt. In our opinion Debi Din intended to confer upon his wife after his death an estate larger than, and possessing incidents different from those appertaining to, the estate which Lachminia would have taken as his widow if Debi Din had died intestate. We hold that he did confer upon her an estate which was more extensive than that which she would have had simply as a Hindu widow, and consequently that the estate conferred upon her became her stridhan, and that the plaintiffs, whether they are Debi Din's reversioners or not, have no title. We allow the appeal, and set aside the decree below and the order of remand, and restore and affirm the decree of the first Court with costs.

THIS was an appeal from an order made upon an application under s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts of the case are as follows:—One Bhagwati Prasad brought a suit on a mortgage against Bir Bhaddar. His suit was decreed by the Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur) on the 9th of September 1885. Bir Bhaddar appealed to the High Court, which, on the 3rd of June 1887, decreed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiff's suit with costs. The plaintiff then, on the 2nd of December 1887, applied for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council. On the 24th of December 1887, Bir Bhaddar, the successful appellant in the High Court, assigned to one Madho Ram the decree which he had obtained from the High Court. Madho Ram had his name entered upon the record of the executing Court as assignee of the decree, and he, and after him his son and legal representative, Jamna Prasad, executed the decree against Bhagwati Prasad. Neither Madho Ram, however, nor Jamna Prasad, was made a party to the record of the appeal in the Privy Council. On the 15th of March 1893, the appeal of Bhagwati Prasad to the Privy Council was decided in his favour. Subsequently Bhagwati Prasad applied to the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur under s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure to recover from Jamna Prasad, in execution of the decree of the Privy Council, the costs, which Madho Ram and Jamna Prasad had realized from him in execution of the decree of the High Court. Jamna Prasad objected that, inasmuch neither he nor Madho Ram had been parties to the decree of the Privy Council, that decree could not be executed against them. This objection was allowed and the decree-holder's application dismissed. The decree-holder thereupon appealed to the High Court.

^{*} First Appeal No. 236 of 1895, from an order of Pandit Rai Indar Narain, Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur, dated the 16th November 1895.

JUDGMENT.

[138] EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—In his appeal in this Court one Bir Bhaddar obtained a decree reversing the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur with costs. Bir Bhaddar was a defendant in the suit. The plaintiff appealed to Her Majesty in Council making Bir Bhaddar the respondent to his appeal. Her Majesty in Council set aside the decree of this Court and restored with costs the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur. Now on the 2nd of December 1887, the plaintiff in the suit presented his application to this Court for a certificate under s. 599 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The certificate was granted in January 1888. On the 24th of December 1887, Bir Bhaddar had assigned the decree for costs which he had obtained in this Court to Madho Ram. The appeal to the Privy Council was admitted on the 25th of July 1888. The order of Her Majesty in Council was dated the 15th of March 1893. The plaintiff in the suit had notice long before the termination of the appeal to Her Majesty in Council that Madho Ram was the assignee of Bir Bhaddar's decree for costs, and, long before the determination of the appeal to Her Majesty in Council, Madho Ram in his lifetime, and subsequently Jamna Prasad, the appellant here, as Madho Ram's representative, executed, under s. 232 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the decree of the High Court for costs against the plaintiff and obtained satisfaction of that decree. The plaintiff took no steps to bring either Madho Ram, or, after his death, his representative Jamna Prasad, on the record of the appeal to Her Majesty in Council. The plaintiff now seeks under s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure to obtain restitution from Jamna Prasad of the costs which he paid under the decree of the High Court to Madho Ram and Jamna Prasad.

Assuming for the present purposes, but not deciding, that s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure would apply to a decree passed in an appeal to Her Majesty in Council, we are of opinion that the plaintiff in the suit cannot have execution of the decree of Her Majesty in Council against Jamna Prasad personally or against him as representative of Madho Ram. Neither Madho [139] Ram nor Jamna Prasad was made a party to the appeal before Her Majesty in Council; and it appears to us that, as neither of them was a party to that appeal, and as Her Majesty in Council did not order that Jamna Prasad personally or as representative of Madho Ram should make restitution, the order of Her Majesty could not be executed so far as Jamna Prasad is concerned.

No case has been brought to our attention in which a decree was held to have been executable under s. 583 for restitution against a person who could have been made, but was not made, a party to the appeal in which the decree was passed. We have been referred to the decision of this Court in Kishen Sahai v. The Collector of Allahabad (1). It appears to us that that case was not in point. In that case the order of Her Majesty in Council set aside the decree of the Sadr Court and restored and affirmed the decree of the District Judge, although one Banke Lal, who had derived a material advantage as a litigant in the suit from the decree of the Sadr Court, was not a party to the appeal to Her Majesty in Council. It does not appear whether or not their Lordships of the Privy Council when they delivered their judgment advising Her Majesty to set aside the decree of the Sadr Court and to restore and affirm the decree of the District Judge were aware that in so doing they were advising that the decree which Banke Lal had obtained from the Sadr Court should be taken away from him, although he was not a party to the appeal to Her Majesty in Council. All that can be said about that case is that Her Majesty in Council having set aside the decree of the Sadr Court, reinstated and affirmed the decree of the District Judge, and under that decree Banke Lal as a party to it was liable.

This Court has, we believe, invariably declined in appeal adversely to alter the position of a decree-holder who has not been a party to the decree before it. We think it would be dangerous to depart from that principle. We dismiss the appeal with costs in this Court and affirm the order of the Court below.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BLAIR, J.—This is an application under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The property of Jhori Singh, the respondent here, had been sold in execution of a decree. The last of the thirty days allowed to a judgment-debtor for making the deposit under s. 310A of the Code of Civil Procedure in this case was a holiday on which the Court was closed. The thirty-first day was also a holiday on which the Court was closed. Upon the thirty-second day Jhori Singh applied to make the deposit under s. 310A. The amount which he proposed to deposit was sufficient to bring him in that respect within the section. The Munsif held that the deposit could not be made, as it had not been made within thirty days of the sale. In so holding the Munsif was wrong. It is true that the Limitation Act (Act No. XV of 1877) did not apply, but clauses 1 and 2 of s. 7 of Act No. 1 of 1887 (The General Clauses Act, 1887) applied. The deposit accordingly was tendered within time and Munsif to the Court of the District Judge. Before the District Judge the question whether or not an appeal lay does not appear to have been raised. The District Judge in appeal set aside the [141] order of the Munsif, and made an order allowing the deposit and setting aside the sale. It is from that order of the District Judge that this application in revision is made.

No appeal lay under s. 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure from an order under s. 310A of that Code. The case did not come within s. 244 of the Code. It was simply a question between the judgment-debtor and the purchaser at auction sale. It was immaterial to the decree-holder whether he received his money from a deposit made by the judgment-debtor or from the price paid by the purchaser at the auction sale. It has been held by this Court that a purchaser at an auction sale is not a representative within the meaning of s. 244 of a party to the suit, in execution of the decree in which the sale has taken place. Consequently the case did not come under s. 244, and the order of the Munsif could not be treated as a decree which was appealable. The District Judge in hearing and determining the appeal before him exercised a jurisdiction not vested in him by law, as no appeal lay to his Court from the order in question. Under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure we make an order setting aside the order of the District Judge in appeal and restoring the order of the Munsif which he had set aside. We regret to be obliged to take this course, as the Munsif was clearly wrong in the order which he made. We make no order as to costs. We may mention that the same question as to jurisdiction was decided by this Court in the unreported case Revision No. 3 of 1896, decided on the 11th of March 1896.

Civil Procedure Code, s. 372; ss. 2, 244, 588—Order dismissing application to be brought on the record—“Decree”—“Order”—Appeal.

An appeal will lie from an order dismissing an application under s. 372 of the Code of Civil Procedure to be brought upon a record as representative of a deceased party, such order being a decree within the meaning of s. 2 of the Code.

THE respondents to this appeal had obtained a decree for sale on a mortgage against one Chaudhri Raj Kunwar, who was the husband of Rani Indo Mati, the appellant. After the death of her husband Rani Indo Mati applied to the Court which had passed the decree (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) stating that the property to which the decree applied had devolved upon her in virtue of the will of Rani Lachhmin Kunwar, to whom it had been transferred on the 19th of September 1895, and praying that she might be made a party to the execution proceedings, and that, under s. 87 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, six months' time Upon this application the Subordinate Judge, without issuing notice to the other side, passed the following order:—"This is not an application on behalf of a party to the suit, but on behalf of a third person. JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—The appellant here, Rani Indo Mati, applied to be brought on the record of a suit for foreclosure in which a decree under s. 86 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, had been made, and to have the day appointed for the [143] payment postponed. She claimed to be the representative in interest of the mortgagor, who was the defendant in the suit. The Court below dismissed her application, apparently on the ground that she was not a party to the record, and that the day appointed by the decree for payment had been twice postponed on the application of the mortgagor. The application was dismissed without notice to the other side. The applicant brought this appeal.

A preliminary objection has been taken on behalf of the respondents that the appeal does not lie. It is contended, and we think rightly, that the application to be brought upon the record was one under s. 372 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in support of the argument that the appeal does not lie clause 2 of s. 588 of the Code has been used to show that the only appeal given by s. 588 from an order passed under s. 372 is an appeal from an order dismissing an objection to an application made under s. 372. There is no doubt that, if the allegations as to title of the appellant are true, the interest of the mortgagor had vested in her before she made her application to the Court below. It appears to us that the dismissal of her application was an adjudication on the representative right which she claimed, and, as an order under s. 372 dismissing an application is not an order specified in s. 588, the order dismissing her application would be a decree as that word is defined in s. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and in our opinion an appeal lay, the case coming within s. 244 of the Code.

The Court below should have issued notice to the other side, and first of all determined the question as to whether the applicant was a representative, and, if she was what she alleged herself to be, she should have been brought on the record, and in that event the Court should have gone on to consider whether or not the time should have been extended under the proviso to s. 87 of the Transfer of Property Act, and that would depend upon whether the applicant succeeded in showing good cause for the postponement. It would be premature on our part to express any [144] opinion as to whether there was good cause or not, as the other side should be allowed an opportunity of producing evidence on the point if necessary. We set aside the order of the Subordinate Judge and remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to his Court for the application to be disposed of on the merits. The costs of this appeal will abide the result.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Section 357 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides a limitation of its own and in substitution for the limitation provided for the execution of decrees by the Indian Limitation Act, 1877.

In this case one Lalman applied to the District Judge of Farukhabad, on the 11th of April 1889, to be declared an insolvent, and was discharged by an order under s. 355 of the Code of Civil Procedure on the 7th of October 1890. On the 21st of February 1896, Gopi Nath, one of the judgment-creditors of Lalman, applied to the Court for execution of his decree against certain property which he alleged to have been acquired by the insolvent subsequently to his discharge. To this application the insolvent objected, pleading, inter alia, that execution of the decree in question, was barred by limitation, the provisions of s. 357 of the Code of Civil Procedure not being exclusive of the rules of limitation for the execution of decrees prescribed by Act No. XV of 1877. This objection was disallowed and execution was ordered to proceed, a new receiver being appointed. The judgment-debtor appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—In our opinion s. 357 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides a limitation of its own and in [145] substitution for the limitation provided for the execution of decrees by the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature that when there was no property other than that previously vested in the receiver and exempted from execution, and no property subsequently acquired possibly until eleven years after the discharge of the insolvent, the judgment-creditors, in order to keep their decrees alive, should be obliged to make fruitless applications for execution during the period to which the provisions of s. 357 apply. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

[23rd December, 1896.]

Act No. III of 1871 (Indian Registration Act), s. 50—Registered and unregistered documents—Priority—Notice.

Held that s. 50 of the Indian Registration Act, 1877, will not avail to give the holder of a subsequent registered deed priority in respect of his deed over the holder of an earlier unregistered deed, not being a compulsorily registrable deed, if in fact the holder of the registered deed has at the time of its execution notice of the earlier unregistered deed. *Abool Hossein v. THIS was a suit for sale upon a mortgage. The mortgage in question was executed on the 14th January 1893, and, being for a sum below Rs. 100, was not registered. The defendants to the suit comprised the mortgagor, a subsequent mortgagee and certain persons who had purchased the property mortgaged to the plaintiff under a registered sale-deed executed subsequently to the plaintiff's mortgage. The vendee defendants resisted the suit, relying on their sale-deed and on s. 50 of the Registration Act, 1877.

[146] The Court of first instance (Munsif of Phaphund) dismissed the plaintiff's claim so far as the defendants vendees were concerned, but him a decree for money against the mortgagor only.

On appeal by the plaintiff, the lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) found as a fact that the defendants vendees at the time when their sale-deed was executed had notice of the plaintiff's mortgage, and, following the decision of the Madras High Court in the case of Krishnamma v. Suranna (3) decreed the plaintiff's claim for sale.

The defendants vendees appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—The suit out of which this appeal arises was brought by the plaintiff, who is respondent here, to recover money due to him under a mortgage-deed. The mortgage is dated the 14th of January 1893. The amount secured by it was less than 100 rupees, and the registration of the deed was not compulsory. It was not registered. On the 9th of January 1895, the appellants before me purchased the mortgaged property by a sale-deed which was registered. It has been found by the lower Court that the appellants, when they bought the property, had notice of the plaintiff's mortgage.

The lower appellate Court, following a Full Bench decision of the Madras High Court (Krishnamma v. Suranna) (1), has held that the fact of the defendants appellants having notice of the plaintiff's mortgage deprived them of the right to rely on the provisions of s. 50 of the Registration Act (Act No. III of 1877), which provides that certain documents shall, if duly registered, take effect as regards the property comprised therein against every unregistered document relating to the same property, not being a decree or order, whether such unregistered document be of the same nature as the registered document or not.

It is clear that this enactment makes no reference whatever to the holder of a subsequent registered document having notice of the prior [147] unregistered one, and lays down broadly that the former shall have priority over the latter; but, notwithstanding this, the High Courts of Madras, Bombay and Calcutta (vide the Madras ruling before quoted: for Bombay, Hathising Sobhai v. Kuvarji Javher (2), and for Calcutta, Abool Hossein v. Raghu Nath Sahu (3), have considered themselves at liberty to apply the equitable doctrine of notice to cases like the present. These have, it would appear, been in a great measure influenced by the decisions of the English Courts; see in particular the case of The Agra Bank v. Barry (4). In that case (at p. 148) Lord Cairns observed that "by decisions which have now well established the law, it has been settled that, notwithstanding the apparent stringency of the words contained in the Act, still if a person registers a deed, and if at the time he registers the deed either he himself or an agent, whose knowledge is the knowledge of his principal, has notice of an earlier deed, which though executed is not registered, the registration which he actually effects will not give him priority over that earlier deed." The ratio decidendi in that case was, it appears, that the object of registration laws being to give parties who enter into a transaction with regard to property notice of previous transactions concerning that property, that object is accomplished if the person who enters into a subsequent transaction has aliunde notice of a deed affecting the property and executed before his own. There is no case in this Court exactly in point, unless it be the decision in Ram Autar v. Dhanauri (5) the facts of which are not quite on all fours with this case. There is, however, no decision of this Court on the question of notice as affecting the provisions of s. 50 of the Registration Act which is adverse to the decisions of the High Courts above referred to. Following those decisions I hold that the plea based on the provisions of s. 50 of the Registration Act must fail. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Effect of a co-sharer vendee joining with himself in his purchase a stranger.

When in the purchase of immoveable property in respect of which a right of pre-emption exists, a vendee, being a person entitled to purchase, joins with himself in the purchase a stranger, then, in the event of a suit for pre-emption being brought, if the interest of the co-sharer vendee can be separated from the interest of the stranger vendee, the plaintiff pre-emptor can succeed only as against the stranger, the rights of the co-sharer vendee being equal or preferential to those of the pre-emptor. If, however, the interest of the co-sharer vendee cannot be separated from the interest of the stranger vendee, the plaintiff pre-emptor can succeed as against both. Sheobharos Rai v. Jiach Rai (1) approved. Sheo Dyal Ram v. Bhyroo Ram (2), Gunesshee Lal v. Zaraut Ali (3), Manna Singh v. Ramadhin Singh (4), referred to.

THIS was a suit for pre-emption based upon a wajib-ul-arz. The wajib-ul-arz provided that co-sharers should have a right of pre-emption if a sale was made to a stranger. The sale in dispute was a sale of shares in four villages. There were several vendees, of whom two were strangers. In the sale-deed the respective share of each vendee was defined, but it was not specified what portion of the sale consideration was to be paid by each vendee. So far as appeared from the deed the purchase money was one lump sum. The plaintiffs, who were co-sharers, made all the vendees defendants to the suit and claimed to pre-empt the whole property covered by the sale-deed.

The Court of first instance (Additional Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur) decreed the claim as against all the defendants, holding, upon the question whether the co-sharer vendees had lost their rights by joining strangers with them in the purchase, that the case was governed by the decision in Manna Singh v. Ramadhin [149] Singh (4) and that the co-sharer vendees having associated strangers with them in the purchase must themselves be regarded as strangers.

The defendants vendees appealed. The lower appellate Court (District Judge of Gorakhpur) dismissed the appeal, holding on the question above referred to that the shares purchased by the strangers could not be separated from the shares purchased by the co-sharer vendees, because not only a separate specification of shares but a separate specification of purchase money was necessary. The District Judge referred to the case of Sheobharos Rai v. Jiach Rai (1).

The defendants vendees appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., BLAIR and BANERJI, JJ.—This was a suit for pre-emption brought on the wajib-ul-arz of the village. By the wajib-ul-arz co-sharers had a right of pre-emption in the case of a sale made to a stranger. The sale in this case was effectuated by one sale-deed. The vendees were five in number, some of them being co-sharers. The share sold to each of the five vendees was specified in the sale-deed, but there was no specification of the proportion of the purchase money which was paid by the respective vendees. The purchase money of the whole was one lump sum, so far as appears from the deed. The plaintiffs, who were co-sharers, brought this suit, making all five vendees defendants and claiming to pre-empt the whole property comprised in the sale-deed. They obtained a decree in the first Court and also in the Court of first appeal. From the decree of the latter Court this appeal has been brought.

The decisions on this point in these Provinces are but four. The earliest reported decision of which we are aware is that in the case of Sheo Dyal Ram v. Bhyroo Ram (1). There was no specification of the separate share sold to each vendee in that case. It was held that the co-sharer vendee must have a decree against [150] him for pre-emption because he had associated with himself in the purchase strangers to the village. The next earliest reported case in these Provinces is that of Guneshee Lal v. Zaraut Ali (2). In that case this Court, wrongly, in our opinion, held that there was no specification of the share sold to each of the purchasers. The Court conceived that the specification in the schedule at the foot of the deed of sale could not be read into the body of the sale-deed as part of the contract between the vendor and the vendees. In our opinion it formed part of the contract. The next case is that of Manna Singh v. Ramadhin Singh (3). There was one joint price with no specification of the proportions in which it was to be borne by the vendees, but the share purchased by each vendee was separately specified. It appears to us that the learned Judges in that case decided it on the principle of law which applies when a co-sharer seeking pre-emption associates with himself in the suit as a plaintiff a stranger to the village. It appears to us that that principle does not apply to a suit against a co-sharer who has associated strangers with himself in his purchase. Where a co-sharer associates with himself as a plaintiff a stranger to the village in a suit in which he seeks to enforce the village contract or the village custom as to pre-emption, he comes into Court asking that the custom shall be enforced against the defendants, although in the very inception and maintenance of his suit he is breaking the custom himself, and he mixes up his own rights as a co-sharer with those of strangers who could have no common right to pre-empt with him. In the case of a defendant co-sharer in a suit for pre-emption who has associated with himself in his purchase a stranger to the village, he stands upon his right as a co-sharer; he seeks the assistance of the Court to enforce nothing. The next and last case upon this subject in the reports of these Provinces is that of Sheobharos Rai v. Jiach Rai (4). In that case the four shares purchased by the respective vendees were separately specified, and the share of the purchase money [151] paid by each separate vendee was also separately specified. In that case this Court held, and we think rightly, that the plaintiffs, who were seeking pre-emption, were not entitled to a decree against the defendant vendee co-sharer. We think that the principle of law applying in these cases is correctly laid down in the following passage from the judgment in the case to which we have last referred:—"In the two last mentioned cases the shares are separately specified, and where such shares are separately specified and the sale to the stranger is distinct and divisible, although contained in one deed, the reason of the rule does not exist. The rule applies only to those transactions which, while contained in one deed, cannot be broken up or separated; and the rule should be so limited, for it would be a very great hardship if the vendee, by the association of a stranger in respect of a small but specified portion of the property purchased, should have to forfeit his entire right of purchase in favour of a sharer having equal, but not preferential, rights." Mr. Justice Mahmood, from whose judgment we have quoted, having, as we conceive correctly, expounded the law on this subject in the passage which we have cited, went on to illustrate his views from the case then before him, and in illustrating his views referred to a sale in which the interests of the vendees were not only separately specified qua share, but qua purchase money. In our opinion where in cases of this kind the sale-deed specifies the interest or share purchased, so that it shows what was the particular property purchased by each of the vendees, whether by definition of share or plot, the vendee co-sharer, who is a co-sharer of equal rights of pre-emption with the plaintiff co-sharer, cannot be disturbed in the rights acquired by him under the sale-deed, and it is immaterial whether the proportion of the purchase money found or to be found by each of the vendees is or is not specified in the sale-deed. It happens in most suits for pre-emption that the Court has to ascertain what was in fact the true price; and the rules which guide the Court in ascertaining what is the true price where there is only one vendee can equally be applied to ascertain what is the share of each vendee in the total amount of [152] the true price paid for the whole property sold. Where the share of each vendee in the property sold is specified in the sale-deed, the actual property to which the right of pre-emption is attached is ear-marked and specified in the sale deed. The object of pre-emption is to exclude strangers from the village and not co-sharers of equal rights. Where from the sale-deed it can be ascertained what is the share, area of property or interest in the village which the stranger has purchased, that share, area or interest alone can be the object of pre-emption in the suit. Where the share purchased and the proportionate price to be paid by each vendee are specified in the sale-deed it would not be necessary to make the co-sharer vendee a defendant in the suit: but where there is no such separate specification of the proportionate part of the purchase money to be paid by each vendee, the co-sharer vendee would be a necessary party to the suit for pre-emption, as the proportionate part of the purchase money of each vendee would have to be ascertained. Where a co-sharer chooses to associate with himself in the purchase a stranger to the village, and the sale-deed does not on the face of it disclose the particular share or interest purchased by the co-sharer vendee on his own behalf, as distinct from the share or interest purchased by the stranger, then the rule of pre-emption can only be enforced by treating the co-sharer vendee as if he were in the same position as the stranger in decreeing pre-emption against him. In such a case the bargain made between the vendees and the vendor is one joint in all its incidents.

It is necessary to refer an issue to the lower appellate Court under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure for findings in order to enable us to dispose of the case. The Court below will try the following issue, taking such evidence as may be produced before it and may be relevant:—

What was the true price paid by each vendee?

The Court will find in the case of each vendee the price paid by him. Ten days will be allowed for filing objections on the return of the finding.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—The parties to this suit are neighbours occupying adjoining houses in the city of Allahabad. The houses stand at right angles to one another. The house of the plaintiff looks towards the west, and that of the defendant towards the south. The land in the angle formed by the houses was alleged by the plaintiff to belong to him. It has been found by the Courts below that this land does not belong to the plaintiff, but is a portion of a public lane, the ownership of which is vested in the Municipality. The plaintiff has a balcony and windows in the front of his house. He came into Court alleging that a month before the date of the institution of his suit the defendant had constructed a balcony supported by stone rests, which, projecting from the front of his (defendant's) house, interfered with the plaintiff's balcony and with the light and air of one of the plaintiff's windows, and he prayed for the demolition of a portion of the defendant's balcony. The lower Courts have given the plaintiff a decree, and the defendant comes here in second appeal. The [154] plaintiff did not in his plaint allege that he had acquired any right of easement. The finding of the Court below is that the plaintiff's balcony and window have not been in existence for more than fifteen years at the outside. It is clear that this term is not sufficient to create a right of easement. But the lower appellate Court, relying on the case Jootoor Achanna v. Vanamala Venkamma (1), has nevertheless decreed the claim. In my opinion that case is not in point. In that case it was held that it was not necessary for the plaintiff, who received light through a window in his wall opening on a piece of vacant ground the property of Government, to establish prescriptive rights against the defendant, who was a wrong doer, and that the mere fact of the plaintiff's enjoyment was sufficient to entitle him to an injunction. The learned Judge who decided that case relied on the decision in Jeffries v. Williams (2). In that case it was objected by the defendants that the plaintiffs had not alleged that they had acquired any right of support from the soil in which the defendants had been excavating mines. In his judgment Parke B. remarked with reference to this plea:—"If it had appeared in the declaration that the soil in which the mines were was the defendant's, or that the defendant had all the right to get the mines which the owner of the adjoining soil had, the objection would have been fatal; because, arguing against a person having the right to the adjoining soil, or claiming under one that had all his rights to interfere with the soil, it would be necessary for the plaintiffs to show a title to a support of the soil according to the doctrine laid down in Wyatt v. Harrison; but if the defendant is not stated in the declaration to have any such right, and is therefore prima facie a wrong doer, the declaration, it seems to us, would be sufficient." It appears from this that the principle upon which that case and the case in the Madras High Court were decided was that the defendant was a wrong doer. In the present case, however, the defendant has received permission from the owner of the soil, that is from the Allahabad Municipality, to construct the balcony which projects from his house. This [155] being so, I am of opinion that the principle of Jeffries v. Williams (2) will not apply, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the relief he asked for, inasmuch as he had not acquired by prescription any easement as against the defendant or the Municipality. Taking this view, I hold that this appeal must succeed. I set aside the decrees of the lower Courts and dismiss the plaintiff's suit with costs in all Courts.

111.In a suit for land and mesne profits, inquiry as to the latter deferred by the judgment—Civil Procedure Code, ss. 45, 212 and 244.

A Court, which had virtually adjudged mesne profits to the claimant in the same judgment in which it decided that she was entitled to the immoveable property claimed, left open the question of the amount of those profits to be decided in subsequent proceedings. In the decree which followed no mention was made of the profits.

Held that it was competent to the Court to defer the inquiry in that manner, nothing in the Code of Civil Procedure preventing such a disposal of the suit. If there had been a technical omission in the decree, it had not affected the right of the plaintiff.

[D., 6 C.W.N. 672.]

APPEAL by special leave from a decree (22nd July 1892) of the High Court reversing a decree (2nd June 1890) of the Sudordinate Judge of Jaunpur.

The point in dispute arose out of the disposal of a claim to land and the mesne profits by a judgment on the 18th June 1880 of a Court which determined the question of title and possession in favour of the plaintiff, but postponed the inquiry as to the amount of the profits to be dealt with in another and future proceeding. The decree had nothing in it as to mesne profits. The decision as to the proprietary right was supported by the judgment of the High Court on the 6th January 1882, and by the order of the [156] Queen in Council in Muhammad Abdul Majid v. Fatima Bibi (1) on the 24th June 1885. As to the mesne profits, the defendant, M. Abdul Majid, raised the question whether it was competent to a Court to hold the inquiry as to them, the decree of the original Court not having ordered them, and the judgment of that Court having separated them from the claim to the title in a manner unauthorized, as he contended, by the Code of Civil Procedure. Act No. X of 1877 was in force when the suit was first heard, but the law under Act No. XIV of 1882 was the same in this respect. Whether the above was a valid objection to the amount of the mesne profits being now determined was the question decided on this appeal.

The claimant's title, as appears in the report in I.L.R., 8 All. 39, was under the will of Muhammad Baksh, father of Fatima and grandfather of M. Abdul Majid, whereby the father of the last-named was entrusted with the management of the property devised. The plaintiff Fatima brought her suit on the 5th May 1879 to obtain possession from the son, with mesne profits from 1283 to 1285, Fasli, inclusive, amounting to about Rs. 90,000. To the latter part of her claim M. Abdul Majid made answer as follows in his written statement, depositing in Court the amount mentioned by him :—"As regards the plaintiff's claim for profits, the defendant never denied it. The plaintiff's allegation is wrong."

" Under a correct and proper account prepared by the defendant (in accordance with the principle admitted during the life-time of the deceased Maulvi) from the account books of the estate, commencing from 1278 Fasli to the end of 1285 Fasli, Rs. 15,168-8-6½ has been found to be due to the plaintiff. The defendant deposits it in Court, together with extracts from accounts."

An issue was fixed as to the amount, and the judgment of the first Court, in the terms which are quoted in full in their Lordships' judgment on this appeal, gave the Court's reason, on the 18th June 1880, for postponing the inquiry into this part of the claim.

[157] The inquiry was fixed for the 13th September 1880, but the absence of the record, for the hearing of the appeal on the other question, caused the first delay. On the plaintiff's petition the High Court, on the 6th June 1881, ordered the Subordinate Court to proceed with the inquiry forthwith.

In their judgment of the 6th January 1882, affirming the decree as to the plaintiff's title, the High Court stated that the question of mesne profits was not before them.

On the 19th July 1882, the High Court again directed that the Subordinate Judge should proceed with the inquiry forthwith.

On the order of the High Court the hearing was fixed for the 29th July 1882, but it was again postponed, and the 29th May 1883 was appointed.

On the 15th December 1882, the defendant applied to the Subordinate Judge for a postponement of the proceedings till the decision of the Privy Council upon the question of title should be known. It was not shown by the record what was done upon this. However, on the 21st July 1883, there was a petition from the defendant before the High Court for their interference, under s. 15 of the Letters Patent of 1866, on the ground that the Subordinate Judge had acted without jurisdiction in proceeding to inquire into the amount of the mesne profits. The following order was then made by Straight, J., who adverted to its not being clear whether the question had been regularly brought before the High Court:—"It would have been better, no doubt, had the decree in terms directed an inquiry, but the judgment virtually does, and the requirement of s. 212 of the Code would therefore seem to have been satisfied. The application is refused with costs." On the 8th November 1883, the defendant filed a petition for special leave to appeal against the last-named order, which was refused with costs on the 12th December 1883.

On the 27th June 1885, the order of Her Majesty, in accordance with their Lordships' report, dismissed the defendant's appeal on the question of title, as reported in I. L. R. 8 All. 39.

[158] In the meantime the case as to the mesne profits was sent by the Subordinate Judge to the District Judge; and by him back to the Subordinate Judge on the 3rd February 1885. On the 24th February 1886, the District Judge, having, as was admitted on all hands, no authority so to do, transferred the decision of the case to the Subordinate Judge. In his order of that date, the District Judge gave his opinion that it would be necessary to have the decree of the 18th June 1880 amended by inserting in it a direction as to mesne profits, and he suggested that this might be done upon a petition from the plaintiff. From this order the plaintiff appealed, but withdrew her appeal on the 15th November 1887. When the case formally came before the Subordinate Judge, no application was made for an amendment of the decree. Beyond the filing of a petition by the defendant that the pending proceeding might be struck off, "as wholly irregular," nothing appeared to be done till the 22nd January 1890, when the 13th March was fixed for hearing. This took place on the 16th May, and judgment was given, on the 2nd June, to the effect that the transfer to the file of the Subordinate Judge was wholly beyond the powers of the District Court, and that the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to decide the case upon the merits. It was, therefore, struck off the file.

Against this order the plaintiff appealed to the High Court, which, on the 22nd July 1892, pronounced the judgment now under appeal. The Court was of opinion that the Subordinate Judge, who first dealt with the case, had power, under s. 45 of the Civil Procedure Code, to try, separately, the questions of title and mesne profits, and that the pending proceeding for the ascertainment of mesne profits was not a proceeding in execution of a defective decree, but a continuation of the original suit, for the purpose of passing a decree upon a part of the case which had been left untried. They agreed that the re-transfer by the District Judge to the Subordinate Judge, on the 24th February 1886, was wholly without jurisdiction, and that the course, he, the Subordinate Judge, ought to have adopted, was to return the [159] papers to the District Judge. This they directed him now to do, setting aside the order of 2nd June 1890. They distinguished Puranchand v. Roy Radhakishen (1), a Calcutta Full Bench decision, from this case.

An application by the defendant for a certificate of the fitness of the case for the admission of an appeal to Her Majesty in Council was refused by the High Court on the 10th February 1893.

The defendant thereupon applied for special leave to appeal alleging that "the principal reason adduced by the High Court for refusing a certificate was that the petitioner might have raised the same points on the previous application for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council in 1883." The order so referred was the order of STRAIGHT, J., above set forth.

The application having been granted.

Mr. J. H. A. Branson, and Mr. W. A. Raikes, appeared for the appellant, on this appeal.*

Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the respondent.

The argument was mainly the following:—The Court of first instance, in its judgment of the 18th June 1882, by dividing the claim into two parts, and deciding one part of the suit itself, and leaving the remaining part to be decided in a future proceeding, acted beyond its powers. Any inquiry or order made, in pursuance of that Court's order, would be irregular and invalid. The decree of the 18th June 1880, having contained nothing as to mesne profits, the Court executing it had no power to entertain a claim for any, or to assess them. The plaintiff had appealed against the order of the Judge of the 24th February 1886 and had afterwards abandoned that appeal. Accordingly, the decision of the Judge was as against her final. Thus the decision of the Subordinate Judge of the 2nd June 1890 striking the case off the file was correct, and met the requirements of the case.

* In this appeal Fatima Bibi was represented by her sons Muhammad Abdul Aziz and others, she having died on the 5th of March 1894.

JUDGMENT.

COUNCIL.

Their Lordships' judgment was delivered on the 9th December 1896 by LORD HOBHOUSE:—

This case exhibits as lamentable a waste of time and money in litigation as ever came under their Lordships' observation. An account which the plaintiff asked for in the year 1879, and to which her right was affirmed in the year 1880, has not even been commenced; the defendant having been allowed to delay it by objections to the formal regularity of the procedure. The question still is whether the respondents, who represent the original plaintiff, shall have the account taken. The High Court has decreed in their favour. The appellant, who was the original defendant, contends that their right has been extinguished.

In May 1879 Fatima Bibi, the mother of the respondents, filed her plaint against Abdul Majid, claiming possession of a share in her father's estate, and mesne profits for three years. She valued the profits at nearly a lac of rupees. The defendant denied the plaintiff's right to possession. He admitted her right to some profits, which he put at somewhat more than Rs. 15,000. He paid that sum into Court, whence it has been paid out to the plaintiff.

In an early stage of the suit it was declared by order of Babu Kashi Nath Biswas, then Subordinate Judge of Jaunpur, that the adjudication on the title should be taken first, and that then the question of profits should be taken up; and the Court adhered to that arrangement, though the times contemplated for the two trials were put off. On the 18th June 1880, Kashi Nath Biswas delivered judgment on the question of title. As to some items the plaintiff's claim was dismissed. As to the bulk of the property the decree was in her favour.

On the other part of the case the Subordinate Judge made the following statement:—

[161] "As the question of mesne profits was to have taken a very long time in examination of jamabandi accounts of numerous villages, it was proposed by the parties that the Court should take up and decide other issues in the case. I should have been glad to decide the whole case together, and with that view I purposely delayed giving judgment on the issues on which I have taken down evidence and heard the arguments on both sides, but, as I am leaving the district, I cannot, in fairness to both parties, any longer refuse to give judgment on the issues tried by me."

And after he had given his decision on the title he added:—"The last two issues cannot now be decided, and must be left to my successor to decide." Those issues related to mesne profits and to costs.

The formal decree was confined to the question of title and possession. It is now contended by the defendant that this mode of proceeding was wholly beyond the power of the Court, and therefore cannot be the ground of any further proceeding in the suit. If indeed the decree had gone on to direct an inquiry as to profits, that, it is admitted, would have been right; but, because the postponed inquiry is only mentioned in the judgment, everything is wrong; and that, though the course taken was proposed by the parties, was adopted by the Court, was attended by manifest advantage, and by no inconvenience that any one can suggest. It is difficult to imagine a more frivolous pretext for resisting a just claim. Their Lordships agree with the High Court that the proceedings were competent to the Court and were substantially right.

(1) 6 W.R. Mis. Rul. 109.

(2) L.R. (1896) A.C. 136.

The defendant appealed from the decree of June 1880, first, to the High Court who affirmed it in January 1882, and, secondly, to Her Majesty in Council who affirmed it in June 1885. The plaintiff was put into possession of her share (it does not appear when, nor is it material), and then there remained no question except those reserved, viz., the profits and the costs of suit.

In the years 1880 and 1881 occurred some not very intelligible transfers of the case from the new Subordinate Judge to the District Judge, Mr. Howell, and back again from the District Judge to the Subordinate Judge, with the result that the question of profits was postponed till after the decision of the High Court on the question [162] of title. After that decision, in February and March 1882, the then Subordinate Judge, Mr. Benerji, settled 14 issues, but did not proceed to try them. The plaintiff complained to the High Court of the delay, and on the 19th July 1882 the High Court ordered the Subordinate Judge to proceed without any further delay. This order appears to have been wholly ineffectual. The Subordinate Judge ordered postponements extending to the 29th May 1883. On that day he refused further postponement, because of the High Court's order, but no progress was made.

The defendant now appears to have changed his tactics, and for the first time we hear him complain that the proceedings of June 1880 were illegal. In some way (we have not got his petition) he brought that question before the High Court who delivered the opinion in which their Lordships have stated their concurrence. That was on the 21st July 1883. The defendant then endeavoured to appeal on this point to Her Majesty in Council, but leave was refused on the 12th December 1883.

After that it seems that the High Court transferred the case into the Court of the District Judge of Jaunpur; but still the suit made no progress. On the 24th January 1886 the then Judge, Mr. Hudson, delivered judgment, but only to bring fresh causes of delay. In direct disregard of the decision of the High Court he gives effect to the defendant's frivolous objection to the procedure of 1880, decides that he is not in a position to dispose of the case, and directs that it shall be restored to the file of the Subordinate Judge. With that, he makes a suggestion that the decree should be rectified and should "determine the period over which "the inquiry into mesne profits shall extend, before entering on the subject-matter of inquiry."

As regards this suggestion, which the Subordinate Judge appears to have taken as an order binding on the parties, the first part is unsubstantial, and the second impracticable. The arrears of profits recoverable are limited by law, but the inquiries necessary to ascertain what the arrears are cannot be limited until the facts are known, which is usually in the course of making the inquiries.

[163] The District Judge also intimates that it is illegal to have a separate trial for the costs of a suit. But the judgment of June 1880 does not contemplate any such thing. Doubtless the costs of the suit would depend on the results of the two disputes, as to profits and as to title, and it was most reasonable and convenient to postpone the decision on costs till all the rest of the suit could be determined.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court against Mr. Hudson's order; but on the 15th November 1889 she withdrew her appeal, which was struck off the file. No explanation is given of the long delay or of the reason for withdrawal. It is now contended by the defendant that the effect of withdrawal was to bind the plaintiff to Mr. Hudson's

On the 2nd June 1890 a third Subordinate Judge, Nil Madhab Rai, delivered his decision. He follows Jaunpur precedents in disregarding the order of his immediate superior and in refusing to touch the question of mesne profits. He holds that, in restoring the case to the Subordinate Judge, Mr. Hudson acted illegally, and that he, Nil Mahdeb Rai, had no jurisdiction. But he adds that, if he had, it would be necessary to follow the suggestions (he calls them orders) of Mr. Hudson, which the plaintiff declined to do. He refuses to send back the case to the District Court; he refuses to report it for order of that Court; not being able to find in the Code any directions for such an emergency. Then, having again stated that there was no case before him, he deals with the case by striking it off the file and apportioning costs.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, who delivered judgment on the 20th July 1892. In recounting the dismal history of the case the learned Judges express an opinion that the delays, which they attribute to the action of the defendant, amount to an abuse of the process of the Courts, and they intimate that the Jaunpur Courts have not done their duty. They re-affirm the [164] opinion given in July 1883 that the course taken by Subordinate Judge Kashi Nath Biswas was a lawful one. They discharge the decree of Subordinate Judge Nil Madhub Rai and direct the file to be sent to the Court of the District Judge.

The amount in question being above the appealable value, and the order being final in its nature as regards the defendant's liability to account, the defendant applied for leave to appeal as in ordinary course, to Her Majesty in Council. The High Court refused leave. By a petition which the defendant presented for special leave it appeared that the main ground for that refusal was that the defendant's grounds for appeal were the same as he might have raised on appeal in 1883; but that is not a valid reason for refusing a certificate for appeal in a case which in other respects is fit for appeal in ordinary course. Of course, their Lordships were not aware, and on an ex parte application they hardly could have been aware, of that which appears after argument and examination, viz., the worthless character of the defendant's objections to the account demanded by the plaintiff.

The learned Judges of the High Court have examined the Code minutely to show that Subordinate Judge Kashi Nath Biswas acted under its provisions. Their Lordships think that such an examination is hardly necessary. The Subordinate Judge had before him a case consisting of two parts; a question of title, and an incidental question of account depending largely on the title. It was for the obvious advantage of the parties, and they proposed, that the first part should be decided and the second reserved for decision. In point of fact the first part has been the subject of successive appeals by the defendant, who successfully struggled against the trial of the second part pending these appeals. If the Code forbade the parties and the Court so to arrange the disposal of a lawsuit, it would be a very startling thing. It is not pretended that the Code contains any such prohibition. Neither can it be pretended that the Court did not do justice in giving a decision on the leading part of the case at a time when it was not possible to decide on the subsidiary part. Even if the Court had erred in [165] form, it was in form only, not misleading or injuring anybody; and to treat such an error as a bar to the proceedings reserved for further decision is a serious miscarriage of justice. Their Lordships are not so well placed as are the Judges of the High Court for forming an opinion on the way in which the Jaunpur Courts discharged their functions; but they think it right to add that nothing in this record leads them to form any opinion of the action of those Courts, since the first judgment in January 1880, more favourable than the opinion expressed by the High Court.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that this appeal ought to be dismissed, and the decree of the High Court affirmed. Whether a fresh reference to the District Judge will bring about an examination of the merits of the case, or only a renewed tossing of it from Court to Court, is, having regard to its previous history, a very obscure problem. But that is all their Lordships can do, except to order the appellant to pay the cost of this appeal.

WILAYAT ALI KHAN (Defendant) v. UMARDARAZ ALI KHAN
AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs).^{*} [9th December, 1896].

Act No. VII of 1870 (Court Fees Act), s. 12—Court fees—Question of deficiency of Court fees not raised in the Court of first instance—Practice—Estoppel.

The plaintiffs, suing in respect of certain plots of land by mistake undervalued their claim with regard to the said land, and in consequence paid an insufficient Court fee on their plaint. This mistake was not discovered until the case had come in appeal before the High Court, and when discovered the deficiency was at once made good. Held that, no plea as to the deficiency in the Court fee having been raised, as it might have been, by the defendant before the decision of the suit in the Court of first instance, such plea could not be raised for the first time in appeal.

[166] THE facts of this case were as follows:—

One Mansab Ali died in 1878. By his will, which was executed in the same year, Mansab Ali endowed a portion of his property for religious purposes, and he gave some of it to his brothers and some to his widow Musammat Mohib-un-nissa. The widow, on the death of Mansab Ali, took possession of some of the property in suit as mutawalli, and of some in her own right, and she also released certain property held on mortgage by Mansab Ali after receiving the mortgage-money. The plaintiffs, who were sons and daughters of brothers of Mansab Ali, sued the widow and one of the brothers of Mansab Ali to recover from them certain property which had not been disposed of by Mansab Ali and to which they alleged themselves to be entitled as heirs under the Muhammadan law. The suit was defended by Mohib-un-nissa, who pleaded, as to some of the property claimed, that it was endowed property, as to some, that it was hers under the will of Mansab Ali, and in any case that she, as an heir to Mansab Ali, was entitled at least to a share in such property.

The Court of first instance, when the suit was first heard, held, on the construction of the will, that there was no property of Mansab Ali which was not covered by the will, and in consequence no property which could be claimed by the plaintiffs, and dismissed the suit. On appeal, the High Court, differing from the Court below in its construction of the will, remanded the case for trial on the merits. On this remand the plaintiffs' suit was in part decreed and in part dismissed.

From this decree the defendant Wilayat Ali Khan appealed to the High Court. He pleaded (1) that the plaint was invalid by reason of a deficiency in the Court fee on the plaint which was not made good until after the expiry of the period of limitation, and (2) that a certain portion of the property in suit was waqf and therefore could not be made the subject of the plaintiffs' suit.

JUDGMENT.

[167] BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The plaintiffs in the suit out of which this appeal has arisen are the heirs of Mansab Ali, who died on the 10th of August 1878. On the 18th of June 1878 he made a will by which he devised certain property to his heirs; he made a waqf of certain other property; and died intestate as regards the rest. It was the property last mentioned, in which a share was claimed by the plaintiffs. The suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance, but, on appeal to this Court the decree of the lower Court was set aside, and the case was remanded, under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for trial on the merits. It has been tried, and the Subordinate Judge has decreed a part of the claim. Both parties have appealed. This appeal has been preferred by the defendant. The original defendant was the widow of Mansab Ali, but, she having died during the pending of the suit, the present appellant was substituted for her as her legal representative.

The first objection raised in this appeal is that the suit was barred by limitation by reason of the plaint having been written on stamp paper of insufficient value, and the deficiency not having been made good until after the expiry of the period of limitation. The plaint was filed on the 13th of May 1890. It was discovered on the 9th of May 1894, that there was a deficiency in the amount of the Court fees payable for the plaint. The deficiency was of a very small amount, and arose out of a mistake which any one under the circumstances might naturally have made. The deficiency had reference to the valuation of the claim in respect of two pieces of land which were revenue-free, but in respect of which, in the patwari's papers, certain sums were entered as payable to Government. These sums were, by a natural mistake on the part of the plaintiffs, assumed by them to be revenue payable for the land, and on that mistaken assumption they valued the claim. As soon as the mistake was discovered they made good the amount of the deficiency. It is true that this was done after the expiry of the period of limitation for the institution of the suit; but we are of opinion that we should not for this reason be justified in allowing [168] the plea of limitation to be raised and in holding the claim to be barred. Under s. 12 of Act No. VII of 1870 the decision of the Court of first instance upon a question relating to valuation, not affecting the question of category is final. Had the objection as to valuation, which has now been raised, been taken before the decision of the suit by the Court of first instance in 1891, and had the decision of the Court upon that question been adverse to the defendant, that decision would have been final. This is a plea which might have been taken before the decision of the suit by the Court of first instance on the first occasion and before the remand by this Court. Under such circumstances, we must hold that the Court must be deemed to have decided the question adversely to the party who now seeks to raise it. We refuse to entertain an objection raised at this stage of the suit and nearly four years after filing of the plaint.

The next objection taken in the memorandum of appeal relates to the house No. 6, in which a school is held. It is contended that this house is a part of the waqf property under the will. The lower Court has held against the defendant on this point, and we are of opinion that its conclusion is right. It is true that the will has provided for the expenses of a school, but there is nothing to show that the building in which the school is held was made waqf property. Another item of property, which the defendant appellant urges is waqf property under the will, is item No. 9 of list B. i.e., grove land No. 4509. The will declared muafi and resumed land adjoining the mosque and idgah to be a part of the waqf property. It has been proved that there is a plot No. 560 which answers fully the description of the land referred to above. It is resumed muafi land, and a grove exists on it. In our opinion the land adjoining the mosque and idgah which was declared to be waqf did not consist of two plots, but was one plot of land on which a grove existed: such a plot is No. 560. The land No. 4509, does, it is true, contain a grove, but it is not resumed muafi land, and therefore it does not answer the description of the property [169] mentioned in the will. In our judgment the Court below has rightly decreed the claim in respect of these two properties. This disposes of the appeal, which we dismiss with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This is the plaintiffs' appeal in the suit out of which appeal No. 252, which we have just now decided, arose. The first plea taken in the memorandum of appeal is that the Court below has erred in holding the claim in respect of item No. 3 of list C attached to the plaint to be barred by limitation. This was an item of Rs. 530 realised from a mortgagor, by whom the amount was due to the deceased Mansab Ali. The [170] lower Court has held that this part of the claim is governed by art. 120 of sch. II of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. It is contended that the article which is applicable to such a claim is art. 123, which provides a limitation of twelve years for a suit for a legacy or for a share of a residue bequeathed by a testator, or for a distributive share of the property of an intestate. It is contended that this is a claim for a distributive share of the property of the deceased. This contention is, in our judgment, untenable. We think that art. 123 refers to a suit in which a plaintiff seeks to obtain his share from a person who, either as an executor or an administrator, represents the estate of a deceased person and is under a legal obligation to distribute shares to those entitled to them. This has been held in several cases, of which it is enough to refer to Sithamma v. Narayana (1). In a recent case decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council, Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (2), which was a suit of a nature similar to the present, their Lordships refused to apply art. 123, and held the claim to be governed by art. 120.

The second plea raised on behalf of the appellants is that the Court below has wrongly held land No. 75 to be waqf property under the will. Mansab Ali by his will included amongst the waqf property a plot of land which he describes as the land of Mukallam. The Court below has held that plot No. 75 is proved to be the land Mansab Ali referred to in his will. The plot No. 75 is in the cultivation of one Jai Kishen, who was called as a witness in this case. He swore that his grandfather was Mukallam, and that the plot was known after the name of his grandfather. The plaintiffs have entirely failed to show that there is any other plot of land which would answer the description in the will, if plot No. 75 is not that land. As to this plot of land the conclusion of the lower Court was, in our opinion, right.

The third plea in the memorandum of appeal relates to shops 4, 7 and 8 specified in list B attached to the plaint. Those three shops are admittedly situated in the old Bazar of the city of Meerut. [171] Now under the will shops situated in the new Bazar were declared to be waqf property. On the face of the will, therefore, the shops in question are not the shops referred to in it. It was certainly open to the defendants to prove that

(1) 12 M. 487.

(2) 21 C. 157.

Mansab Ali owned no shop in the new Bazar, and, if they had given evidence to that effect, they might well have contended that the shops situated in the old Bazar were the shops which Mansab Ali declared to be waqf. In this case there is not a particle of evidence to show that Mansab Ali had no shops in the new Bazar. The learned counsel for the appellants states that he is instructed that Mansab Ali had shops in the new Bazar which would answer the description of the property mentioned in the will. Had the defendants been able to prove that Mansab Ali did not own any such shops, the conclusion of the Court below, that the word "new" as used in the will was a clerical mistake, might have been supported. But, in the absence of such evidence, we cannot hold that the shops in the old Bazar were the shops meant by the testator. This objection of the appellants must prevail, and the claim in respect of the shops 4, 7 and 8 must be decreed.

The last ground in the memorandum of appeal questions the correctness of the ruling of the lower Court, that the widow of Mansab Ali was entitled to a one-fourth share of the buildings left by her husband. Mansab Ali was a Shia. According to the best authority on the Shia law, a childless widow takes nothing out of her deceased husband's land, but she inherits a share of the buildings left by him. (Baillie's Digest of Moohummudan Law, Imameea Code, p 295). This view was adopted by this Court in Mussumat Toonanjani v. Mussumat Mehndee Begum (1). We, therefore, overrule the fourth plea of the appellants.

Objections under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure have been taken by the respondents, of which the first only has been argued before us. That objection relates to item No. 2 in list C attached to the plaint. It was an item of Rs. 450 realized by the respondent on account of a mortgage-debt due to Mansab Ali. [172] The lower Court has held that the claim in respect of that item is governed by art. 120. The contention before us is that, when the amount of the mortgage-debt was realized by the widow of Mansab Ali, it became money received by her to the use of the plaintiff, and therefore, the claim in respect of such money was governed by art. 62 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877. In support of his contention Mr. Ghulam Muftaba cited the case of Kundun Lal v. Bansidhar (2). That case is entirely in favour of his contention, and we should have followed it had it not been for the ruling of the Privy Council in the case of Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu above referred to. In that case the plaintiff, as the widow of the deceased owner, claimed among other properties certain cash and deposit money received and appropriated by her husband's brother, but their Lordships held that for a suit of this description there was no article in the schedule which was clearly applicable, and therefore art. 120 governed the case. We are unable to distinguish that case from the present, and, following the ruling in that case, we disallow the objection under s. 561. We allow the appeal to the extent indicated above, that is to say, we decree the claim in respect of the shops No. 4, 7, and 8 in list B attached to the plaint. Quoad ultra the appeal is dismissed. The parties will pay and receive costs in proportion to their failure and success.

Zamindar—Rights of zamindar in respect of waste lands—Wajib-ul-arz—Provisions of wajib-ul-arz as to rights of pasturage.

Held that a general provision contained in a wajib-ul-arz that village cattle might graze on the waste lands of the village could not be construed, in the absence of any definite covenant to that effect, as depriving the zamindar of his right to reclaim such waste lands.

[173] THE plaintiff in this case held a lease, dated the 19th of September 1893, from the Raja of Jaunpur of a certain plot of waste land appertaining to a village. On his attempting to bring under cultivation the land so leased, he was resisted by certain of the villagers, defendants to the suit, who alleged that they had a right of pasturage over the land, that the image of the tutelary deity of the village was placed thereon, and that the Holi fire also used to be burned upon it. The plaintiff sued for possession of the land leased to him, for the removal of the image of the village deity, and for damages.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Azamgarh) found that, under the wajib-ul-arz of the village, the defendants had a right to graze their cattle on the waste land in suit, and accordingly dismissed the plaintiff's suit on that ground. The plaintiff appealed.

The lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh) found that, according to the wajib-ul-arz, it was provided that the residents of that village would continue to graze their cattle on uncultivated land; but held that this only gave them that right so long as the land remained waste land and did not preclude the zamindar from reclaiming the waste lands belonging to the village. It found also that the image of the village deity had only been recently placed upon the particular plot in question, and that the Holi fire had been burned thereon simply for the purposes of that suit. The Court accordingly decreed the claim of the plaintiff for an injunction restraining the defendants from interference with the plaintiff's rights in respect of the land in suit. The defendants appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J.—This is defendants' appeal. The facts briefly appear to be that the Raja of Jaunpur, who is zamindar of the lands which form the subject-matter of this appeal, recently gave a lease of them to the plaintiff. The plaintiff proceeded to reclaim those lands and bring them into cultivation, when he was obstructed [174] by some of the residents, tenants and others, in the village, who claim a right of pasture over the said lands. The first Court dismissed the claim, the second gave plaintiff a decree for possession, but without damages. In appeal it is urged that, under the terms of the wajib-ul-arz, the defendants had acquired a permanent and perpetual title to pasture their cattle on the lands in dispute. The lower appellate Court has come to the conclusion that the wajib-ul-arz did not grant any such right. The words in the wajib-ul-arz go no further than to provide that the village cattle may graze on waste land in the same manner as they were in the habit of grazing at the time of the preparation of the wajib-ul-arz. But that document contains no undertaking or covenant by the zamindar owner of the village not to reclaim or bring under cultivation any land which then was waste land. That, however, is what the defendants appellants ask by this appeal. They practically say that the owner of the village has no power to bring under cultivation any land which was waste land when the wajib-ul-arz was prepared. I can find no support for that contention in the wajib-ul-arz. It does no more than give effect to the almost universal custom of these Provinces, which permits village cattle to graze on waste land; but to go further, and to hold that that permission takes away from the zamindar the power to reclaim waste land is a serious inroad on the proprietary rights of the zamindar for which I know of no authority. I dismiss this appeal with costs.

In a suit upon a mortgage for the sale of the property mortgaged, the Court has no power to allow in the account under s. 86 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, or in its declaration under that section, interest for a period beyond the date of payment which has to be fixed within six months from the date of the decree.

property, namely, Amolak Ram and Phul Chand, were made defendants. In due course an order under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, was made. Subsequently to the making of that order Mukand Singh raised an objection to the decree-holders' claim to recover interest on the decretal amount for any period beyond the six months allowed by the decree for the payment of the money. Amolak Ram and Phul Chand also raised the same objection. But, inasmuch as Mukand Singh's objection was allowed by the Subordinate Judge and the amount recoverable in execution was reduced, the application of Amolak Ram was not prosecuted and was struck off on the 9th of July 1892. The decree-holders, however, appealed to the High Court and, pending that appeal, Mukand Singh came to terms with the decree-holders and agreed to pay interest to the date of realization, and this appeal was decreed by consent on the 1st of February 1894.

On the 25th of May 1894 the decree-holders applied for execution of their decree. Amolak Ram and Phul Chand thereupon objected, as on the previous occasion, that the decree-holders were only entitled to get interest on the amount decreed to them up to the date within six months from the date of the decree which was fixed by the decree for the payment of the decretal amount.

On the hearing of this objection, the decree-holders raised the point that the objectors were precluded by the dismissal of their previous objection from again raising this question as to interest. [176] The Court, however, over-ruled them on this point and proceeded to hear the objection of Amolak Ram on the merits. The Subordinate Judge of Aligarh held on a construction of the decree, in which construction he was aided by a comparison of the decree with the terms of the judgment on which it was based, that the decree did give the plaintiffs interest on the amount decreed from the date of the suit to the date of the realization of the decretal money. The Court of first instance accordingly dismissed the objection.

The defendants, Amolak Ram and Phul Chand, appealed to the High Court.

The Hon'ble Mr. Colvin and Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellants.
Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C J., and BLAIR, J.—Lala Lichini Narain and others obtained a mortgage of certain immoveable property. On that mortgage they brought a suit for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. They obtained a decree under that section. The Court decreed Rs. 29,171-3 as the principal amount due with interest up to the date of suit, Rs. 2,873-6 for interest from the date of suit to the date of the decree, and Rs. 1,012 for interest from the date of the decree to the 2nd of January 1889, which was a date within six months of the date of the decree. It also decreed costs and gave interest on the costs until realization. The amount of the decree, apart from costs and interest on the costs, was Rs. 33,056. The question is as to whether the Court decreed interest on the mortgage money after the 2nd of January 1889, or not. That portion of the decree upon which this question turns has been variously translated. One translation is given by the Subordinate Judge in his judgment in this case. Another translation was made by an official of this Court; and a third translation has been made by Mr. Lyons, who is the head translator of this Court, on a dispute arising as to the correctness of the translation during the hearing of this appeal. The translation made by Mr. Lyons is as follows: "And it is ordered that the plaintiffs' claim be decreed to the extent of Rs. 29,171-3, and the rest of the claim to the extent of [177] Rs. 11,697-7 be dismissed; that on the amount of the claim decreed the plaintiffs receive proportionate costs; that on the amount decreed from the date of suit, Rs. 2,873-6, and that, on the amount of costs from to-day up to the date of payment, the plaintiffs receive interest at the rate of Rs. 6 per cent. per annum." That portion of the decree was subsequent to the portion of the decree in which the actual amounts were decreed.

Now it is contended on behalf of the decree-holders that the decree gave them interest on the principal amount beyond the date of the expiration of the six months which the Court fixed as the time when the payment should be made. We must see what would have been a legal decree in this case. A decree for sale can only be made under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. It is as well to bear that in mind. The decree which can be made in a case like this is that which is specified in s. 88 of that Act. A decree for sale according to s. 88 shall be to the effect mentioned in the first and second paragraphs of s. 86 of that Act—"and also ordering that, in default of the defendant paying as therein mentioned, the mortgaged property, or a sufficient part thereof, be sold, and that the proceeds of the sale (after defraying thereout the expenses of the sale) be paid into Court and applied in payment of what is so found due to the plaintiff, and that the balance, if any, be paid to the defendant or other persons entitled to receive the same." In order to see what would be a decree to the effect mentioned in s. 86, we must look at s. 86. We find that by the first paragraph of s. 86 the Court shall make a decree ordering that an account be taken of what will be due to the plaintiff for principal and interest on the mortgage and for his costs of the suit, if any, awarded to him, on the day next hereinafter referred to, or declaring the amount so due at the date of such decree. It is obvious that the words of s. 88—"what is so found due to the plaintiff"—must mean the amount referred to in the first paragraph of s. 86, that is, either the amount found due by the account directed to be taken in that section or the amount which the Court at the time [178] of passing its decree declares to be due. It is also obvious that under s. 86 no future interest beyond a date within six months of the date of the decree can be entered in the account or declared by the Court; and from s. 88 it is obvious that the proceeds of the sale decreed under that section must be applied, after payment of the expenses of the sale, in payment of "what is so found due to the plaintiff," and that the balance, if any, must be paid to the defendant or other person entitled to receive the same. The section clearly shows that it is only the amount originally declared at the time of making the decree or found to be due under the account provided for by s. 86, which the Court can pay over to the plaintiff out of the proceeds of the sale, and that the Court has no power to allow in the account under s. 86 or in its declaration under that section interest beyond the date which has to be fixed within six months from the date of the decree. In certain events, in adjusting the amount to be paid to a mortgagee, certain additional costs are to be added under s. 94 of the Act to the mortgage money, but there is absolutely no provision that we are aware of for adding additional interest.

Now it appears to us that the granting of interest on the costs decreed was in contravention of s. 86. The power exercised by Courts to grant interest up to realization under the Code of Civil Procedure appears, in the case of decrees for sale, to be excluded by ss. 86 and 88 of the Transfer of Property Act. It would be well if Courts, whether of first instance or of appeal, in cases arising under the Transfer of Property Act, would read and consider the sections of that Act which contain the law on the subject which the Legislature in India has thought it necessary to enact. We have no power as Judges in India to alter the Statute Law and we have no power to make decrees which are not in accordance with that Statute Law, when the Statute Law provides for the form of the decree to be made. It is not safe to assume that the law of the Transfer of Property Act is the law which was administered in the Courts of Chancery in England. In the present case, if we were to construe the decree as we are asked to [179] construe it on behalf of the decree-holders, we should be holding that the Judge who made the decree made a decree which was beyond his jurisdiction, and which was not contemplated by ss. 86 and 88 of the Transfer of Property Act. In our opinion, where it is possible to do so, we should put such a construction on the decree as would make the decree one in accordance with the law. It is true that, in granting interest on the costs, the decree goes beyond what the law allows, but in other respects we can construe the decree, and we do, as one fixing the amount due for principal and interest up to the 2nd of January 1889; and for that amount, plus the costs decreed and the interest wrongly decreed on those costs and any costs coming under s. 94 of the Act, the property can be sold.

After the decree for sale under s. 88 was made, default was made in payment of the amount due, and thereupon the Court under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act made an order for sale. The order is rather a confused one. It is quite clear that under s. 89 the Court had no power to increase the amount for which the property might be sold, except in case it allowed extra costs under s. 94. It wrongly states in the order the amount which had been found due; but s. 89 is specific, and, no matter what the order under that section was, the Court would be bound to apply the proceeds of the sale in the manner mentioned in s. 88. The decree-holders attempted to execute the decree and order for an amount which included interest on the principal amount, and also for interest subsequent to the 2nd of January 1889. The mortgagors objected that execution could not be had for interest on the principal in respect of the period subsequent to the date fixed, which was the 2nd of January 1889. The appellants in the case before us, who were purchasers before suit of portions of the mortgaged property, raised a similar objection. The Court held that the objection raised by the mortgagors was good. Subsequently, in an appeal to which these appellants were no parties, an arrangement was made between the mortgagors and the decree-holders by which future interest should [180] be payable. It is needless to observe that that arrangement and the decree in appeal which was passed in accordance with it did not bind the present appellants. Subsequently, on the decree-holders proceeding to obtain execution by sale, these applicants again objected that interest on the principal amount and interest after the 2nd of January 1889 could not be included in the sum for which the property could be sold, so far as they were concerned. The Subordinate Judge dismissed their objection, and from that order of dismissal this appeal has been brought.

In our opinion ss. 86, 88 and 89 are quite clear and leave no reason to doubt that the objection of these appellants was good in law. In coming to the above conclusion we have not overlooked the provisions of ss. 209 and 222 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion those sections cannot affect the special provisions of the Transfer of Property Act. We construe the decree on this particular point, as it may be construed, as a lawful decree under s. 88, and not as an illegal decree, as it would be if the contention of the decree-holders was correct, and we hold that the property cannot be sold in respect of any interest after the 2nd of January 1889, except such interest as was wrongly decreed on costs. We allow this appeal with costs.

Appeal decreed.

Act No. IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), ss. 87, 89, 92, 93—Redemption of a mortgage—Decree for redemption—Extension of time limited for payment of decretal amount—Execution of decree.

In the case of a decree for redemption or for foreclosure under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, both of which decree stand in this respect upon the same footing, no extension of the time limited by the decree for payment of the decretal amount can be made except for good cause shown, whether the order under s. 87, in a suit for foreclosure, or the order under s. 93, in a suit for redemption, has been applied for or not. Pooresh Nath Mojumdar [181] v. Ramjodu Mojumdar (1) dissented from. *Kanara Kurup v. THIS was an appeal arising out of the dismissal of an application under s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, that a certain mortgage might be declared to be foreclosed.

In 1869 one Tulsa Kuar mortgaged, by a deed of conditional sale, certain immoveable property to Kirpa Ram and others. The deed provided that the property should be redeemed within three years and that, if it were not so redeemed, the mortgagees should get possession, and, after so obtaining possession, the profits were to be applied first in payment of the interest on the mortgage-debt and then in reduction of the principal. The term of the mortgage was twelve years. In 1872 the mortgagees got a decree for possession which they subsequently executed. Upon this, one Raj Kuar brought a suit for pre-emption against the mortgagees, and on the 22nd of September 1874 obtained a decree conditioned on her paying the mortgage money and interest. Afterwards, on the 3rd of October 1874, Raj Kuar sub-mortgaged her right as mortgagee under the pre-emption decree to Ishri Prasad, Ram Lal and others for Rs. 7,500. The money so secured was deposited to satisfy the pre-emption decree and possession was obtained on the 6th of November 1874. Tulsa Kuar, the original mortgagor, executed another mortgage in favour of Raj Kuar for Rs. 1,500. Ishri Prasad, Ram Lal and others, the sub-mortgagees, then sued for the recovery of their mortgage-debt and obtained a decree against Raj Kuar on the 28th of September 1888. After that Tulsa Kuar instituted a suit for redemption against Raj Kuar, to which, Ishri Prasad and others, the sub-mortgagees, were made parties. Tulsa Kuar obtained a decree for redemption on the 20th of April 1889 on the condition that Rs. 9,149 should be paid within six months otherwise the mortgage to be foreclosed. This decree was confirmed by the High Court on the 28th of April 1891. Tulsa Kuar did not deposit the mortgage money within the time specified. Meanwhile Ishri Prasad and others executed [182] their decree. They caused the rights of Raj Kuar as mortgagee to be sold and purchased them themselves on the 21st of September 1891. On the 20th of February 1893, Ishri Prasad, in execution of a decree of his own, brought to sale and purchased the mortgagor's rights of Tulsa Kuar, and, subsequently to that purchase, he deposited in Court the mortgage money, according to the decree for redemption obtained by Tulsa Kuar in 1889, minus his one-third share, and prayed for execution of the decree for redemption in his favour. On the 19th of March 1894, Ram Lal and others, the remaining mortgagees, applied for an order absolute for foreclosure of the mortgage under s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. This application was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri. The applicants thereupon appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—In 1869, Musammatt Tulsa Kuar executed a compound kind of mortgage, which provided that, if the mortgage money was not paid within three years, the mortgage should be one by conditional sale and the mortgagees should have possession. The mortgage money was not paid within three years and the mortgagees obtained possession. The mortgagor brought a suit for redemption under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, and on the 20th of April 1889 obtained a decree for redemption under s. 92 of that Act. The decree fixed the 20th of October 1889 as the day on or before which payment was to be made, and, the mortgage being one by conditional sale, decreed, in the event of non-payment by the date fixed, that the mortgagor should be absolutely debarred of all right to redeem the property. As is usual in these cases, the amount was not paid on or before the 20th of October 1889, and no application by the mortgagor, or by any representative of the mortgagor's interest as mortgagor, was made under s. 93 to the Court to postpone the day fixed by the decree under s. 92 for payment until the [183] 14th of March 1894, when one of the mortgagees, who in the meantime had acquired by purchase the mortgagor's interest, paid the mortgage money into Court. On the 19th of March 1894, the other mortgagees or their representatives applied for an order under s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act debarring the mortgagor, and all persons claiming through her, of all right to redeem the mortgaged property. That application of the 19th of March 1894 was dismissed, and from the order of dismissal this appeal has been brought.

It seems to have been assumed by the Court below that it was at liberty to do, without reference to the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, that which the Court of Chancery in England used to do in suits for foreclosure, namely, to extend the time within which the mortgage money might be paid; and the Court below further assumed that it had this power even in a case in which there was no cause shown for postponing the day for payment. The practice of the Court of Chancery in England in the case of a suit for redemption differed materially in those respects from its practice in the case of a suit for foreclosure. In the case of a suit for redemption, it does not appear to have been, except possibly in a very exceptional case, the practice of the Court of Chancery in England to extend the time within which the decreed redemption money might be paid. The cases showing what the practice of the Court of Chancery was are collected at pp. 1104 and 1106 of Coote on Mortgages, 5th edition.

Whatever may have been, or may now be, the practice in England in suits for redemption or foreclosure of a mortgage, what we are concerned with in India is the law on this subject which the Indian Legislature, being a competent body to legislate in that respect, has enacted shall be followed by Courts in this country. That law is provided for us in the Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (Act No. IV of 1882). So far as the power of a Court to extend the time in a suit for redemption or in a suit for foreclosure in India is concerned, the power and jurisdiction of the Court are limited, in the case of foreclosure, by s. 87. [184] and, in the case of redemption, by s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act, and in that respect the two suits are placed on exactly the same basis; in neither case has a Court, which is bound to obey the law of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, power to extend the time for payment except on good cause shown.

Now, in this case, there was no good or other cause shown why the Court should postpone the date fixed by the decree which was passed under s. 92 of the Act for payment to the defendant. The Courts in India, where the Indian Legislature has made express provisions on the subject, have no power to arrogate to themselves the jurisdiction which was exercised by the High Court of Chancery in England. In our opinion the application of the mortgagees, respondents here, of the 19th of March 1894, for an order under s. 93 debarring the mortgagor, and any one claiming under her, of all right to redeem should have been granted.

It has been contended that—inasmuch as s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, enacts that, “on the passing of any order under this section, the plaintiff’s right to redeem, and the security, shall, as regards the property affected by the order, both be extinguished; provided that the Court may, upon good cause shown and upon such terms, if any, as it thinks fit, from time to time, postpone the day fixed under s. 92 for payment to the defendant,”—the mortgagor or the purchaser of the equity of redemption had a right, until such order was made under s. 93, to come into Court at any time and make payment of the redemption money, and to do so without even having obtained an order on good cause shown postponing the day for payment. Now, if there was nothing else than the proviso to s. 93 to show that that contention was unsound, the proviso would meet the argument. But earlier in the section we find in the second paragraph, which is the paragraph which deals with what is to happen on default of payment, the words “if such payment is not so made.” These words, in our opinion, must refer to a payment made in accordance with the decree passed under s. 92, and indicate [185] that, unless the Court makes an order under the proviso to s. 93, there is no right in the mortgagor in a suit for redemption to make the payment after the date fixed in the decree has passed. The order under s. 93 debarring the mortgagor of all right to redeem would be, when drawn up, a document of title in the hands of the mortgagees, as it would show that the right to redeem allowed by the decree under s. 92

The opening words of the second paragraph of s. 87, which relates to a suit for foreclosure, are the same as the opening words of the second paragraph of s. 93 which relates to redemption. In our opinion, no matter what the practice of the Court of Chancery in England may have been, the intention of the Indian Legislature, as expressed by it in the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, was that there should be no extension of time, except for good cause shown, whether the order under s. 87 in a suit for foreclosure, or the order under s. 93 in a suit for redemption, was applied for or not.

We cannot agree with the decision of the High Court at Calcutta in Pooresh Nath Mojumdar v. Ramjodu Mojumdar (1), the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act being in our opinion clear in this matter. As to the case of Kanara Kurup v. Govinda Kurup (2), it is to be observed that there was no decree in that case, under s. 92, as to what should happen in case payment was not made within the time fixed.

We allow this appeal, and direct that an order be drawn up under s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act debarring the mortgagor, and all those claiming under her, of all right to redeem the mortgaged property. The appellants will have the costs of this appeal and of the application in the Court below. Of course, the persons who paid the mortgage money into Court will be entitled to get it out, their application being necessarily dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—The respondent on the 7th of May 1891 obtained a decree for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, against the appellant here. Subsequently to the making of that decree, and after expiration of the time for payment limited by the decree, the respondent obtained an order under s. 89 of that Act. Later still, after the making of that order, the parties agreed that the appellant here might pay by instalments, part of the consideration for that agreement being an increase by about Rs. 2,000 of the decretal debt and certain provisions as to the payment of additional interest. The Court sanctioned the agreement under s. 257-A. of the Code of Civil Procedure. The respondent now seeks to have execution of the decree and the agreement, or rather to have execution for the amounts mentioned in the agreement and for the additional interest mentioned in the agreement. The Court below granted the application, and from that order this appeal has been brought.

Mr. Roshan Lal, for the respondent, has contended that an agreement of this kind which has been sanctioned by the Court [187] can be enforced by execution as if it were a decree, and in fact that it varies the decree. He has relied on Ameer-un-nissa Khatoon v. Meer Mahomed Hossein (1) and on Sita Ram v. Dasrath Das (2). The case in Calcutta decided nothing of the kind; in fact it left the question open to be decided subsequently whether the decree-holder could enforce his decree for anything not specifically decreed. The Full Bench case in this Court certainly supports to some extent Mr. Roshan Lal's argument. It decided that, where there was a sulahnamah relating to a decree which had been sanctioned under s. 257A of the Code of Civil Procedure, the decree might be executed in accordance with its provisions. In that case the sulahnamah imposed an additional burden on the judgment-debtor not imposed by the decree. We doubt if that view of the law would be considered a good one at the present day. Fortunately, it does not bind us in this case, for, although the decree in that case was one in enforcement of a hypothecation by sale, the decree was made in 1881, and consequently was not a decree for sale under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Section 210 of the Code of Civil Procedure enables a Court after passing a decree for the payment of money, on the application of the judgment-debtor and with the consent of the decree-holder, to order the amount decreed to be paid by instalments on such terms, as to the payment of interest, attachment of the property or otherwise, as the Court thinks fit. Such an application must be made within six months of the date of the decree. By the same section it is enacted that, "save as is provided by that section and s. 206, no decree shall be altered at the request of the parties." That section does not apply to a decree for sale, which is not a decree for money, and which can only be made under the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, since that Act came into force. It is obvious that, where a decree for sale is made under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, no subsequent agreement between the parties can increase the amount for which the property is to be sold in case default of payment is made. Under s. 88 the decree must direct that [188] the proceeds of the sale, after defraying thereout the expenses of the sale, shall be paid into Court "and applied in payment of what is so found due to the plaintiff, and that the balance, if any, be paid to the defendant or other persons entitled to receive the same." "what is found due to the plaintiff" refer to what is found due in the account or by the declaration of the Court mentioned in s. 86. The order under s. 89 can only be an order that the property, or a sufficient part thereof, be sold and that the proceeds of the sale be dealt with as is mentioned in s. 88. There is no provision in s. 88 or s. 89 such as those contained in the proviso to s. 87, which is the section relating to suits for foreclosure, or in s. 93, which is the section relating to suits for redemption. We can only come to the conclusion that a decree for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act can only be executed as provided by that Act, that is, for the amount decreed or found in account to be due, and that the order for sale cannot, except with regard to any additional costs which may be provided for by s. 94, extend in any way the liability of the judgment-debtor or his property under the decree. All that this decree-holder is entitled to under the order under s. 89 is to have his decree executed for the amount decreed and the expenses of the sale and for any additional costs which may be incurred under s. 94. He cannot have execution of the agreement by which time was given. As the application was one for execution of the agreement, we allow this appeal and dismiss the application with costs.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—This appeal arises out of a suit brought by the plaintiff for the redemption of a mortgage. The plaintiff succeeded in the Court of first instance, but on appeal the learned Subordinate Judge reversed the decree of the Munsif and dismissed plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff comes here in second appeal. It appears that, on the 27th of July 1877,

Hiraman and Jauhari, the plaintiff's predecessors in title, executed a simple mortgage of a shop in favour of one Baldeo Das, the representative in title of the defendants-respondents. The plaintiff's allegation was that, although the mortgage was a simple one, the mortgagors and mortgagee entered into an oral agreement whereby the mortgagee was put into possession of the property for a term of seventeen years, and it was covenanted that after the expiry of the seventeen years the property was to be restored to the mortgagors and the mortgage-debt considered to be discharged. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants, when called upon to vacate the shop after the expiry of the seventeen years, refused to deliver up possession, and hence he was obliged to sue to recover possession. The lower appellate Court has found that the plaintiff has failed to prove the allegation upon which he came into Court, and has not succeeded in showing that defendants are in the possession in virtue of the mortgage. It appears that, after the mortgage above referred to, Mathura Das and Jamna Das obtained a simple money decree against the plaintiff in this suit, in execution of which the plaintiff's equity of redemption in respect the property in dispute was brought to sale, and purchased by one Mohan. It is found that the defendants-respondents are the heirs of Mohan. Consequently, [190] as they are also the representatives of the mortgagees, they have, if the sale to Mohan was a good one, become full owners of the property. The plaintiff contends that, notwithstanding that sale of the equity of redemption, he is nevertheless entitled to maintain the present suit, because Mohan, the auction-purchaser, failed to obtain from the Court a certificate of sale. Reliance is placed upon s. 316 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, "so far as regards the parties to the suit and persons claiming through or under them, the title to the property sold shall vest in the purchaser from the date of such certificate and not before." It must be allowed that these words, the interpretation of which has caused considerable difficulty to the Court, lend some colour to the appellant's contention, but I am of opinion that it cannot prevail. It is not denied that the sale to Mohan was confirmed by the Court. Section 314 of the Code provides that no sale of immoveable property in execution of a decree shall become absolute until it is confirmed by a Court. Moreover, the date of the certificate referred to in s. 316 is not to be the date on which the certificate is drawn up, but the date upon which the sale is confirmed. It has further been held that, as it is the duty of the Court to grant a certificate, no limitation applies to an application for a sale certificate. It was held by the Privy Council that s. 259 of Act No. VIII of 1859, which corresponds to s. 316 of the present Code, did no more than create statutory evidence of the transfer in place of the old mode of transfer by a bill of sale. It is true that s. 259 differs somewhat from s. 316 of the present Code. By the former section the certificate, it is said, "shall be taken and deemed to be a valid transfer of the right, title and interest sold." But even under the present Act it has been held,—vide Dagdu v. Pancham Sing Gangaram (1),—that although the auction-purchaser may not obtain a full title until a certificate has been granted, this must not be considered as necessarily destroying any lesser interest which arises by reason of general equitable principles. This ruling was followed by this [191] Court in Het Ram v. Baldeo (2). As the plaintiff's equity of redemption

NAKCHEDI RAM (Plaintiff) v. RAM CHARITAR RAI AND OTHERS
(Defendants).^{*} [18th December, 1896.]

Act No. IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), s. 68 (c) — Usufructuary mortgage — Dispossession of mortgagee by a trespasser — Suit for recovery of the mortgage money.

The words "any other person" in the concluding portion of clause (c) of s. 68 of the Transfer of Property Act mean "any other person having a title." The disturbance of the mortgagee's possession by a trespasser will not confer upon the mortgagee a right to sue the mortgagor for the mortgage money. Gopalasami v. Arunachella (1), followed.

THE plaintiff-appellant in this case being a usufructuary mortgagee sued his mortgagors and other defendants for the recovery of the mortgage money. The facts of the case are briefly as follows:—

The defendants Nos. 1 to 4 executed a mortgage deed in favour of the plaintiff's father on the 20th of June 1885, under which 6 bighas 10 biswas, 19 dhurs of land cultivated by tenants were mortgaged. The defendant No. 5 was the vendee of the property of the defendant No. 1 under the document, dated the 2nd of July 1889. The defendants Nos. 6 and 7, as stated by the plaintiff, alleged themselves to be the mortgagees of a portion of the mortgaged lands. The plaintiff complained that possession was not delivered to him and that he had sued several tenants, but the suits were dismissed by the Revenue Court. The plaintiff sued [192] for possession and for a certain amount of interest, and, in default of possession, for payment of the mortgage-money.

The defendant No. 1 pleaded that he had sold his property and had no further connection with it. The defendants Nos. 2 to 5 pleaded that they had done nothing contrary to the terms of the mortgage deed, that the plaintiff had all along been collecting the rent of the mortgaged land and that they had executed no mortgage in favour of the defendants Nos. 6 and 7. The defendant No. 6 did not appear. Defendant No. 7 pleaded that he was a prior mortgagee of part of the lands in question in the suit and that he could not be dispossessed until the amount of his mortgage was paid off.

The Court of first instance decreed the claim in part as against the defendants Nos. 6 and 7, but dismissed the claim for the realization of the mortgage money from the mortgagors.

The plaintiff appealed. The lower appellate Court (Additional Subordinate Judge of Ghazipur) dismissed the appeal, holding that there had been no obstruction on the part of the mortgagors, who had done what they could to put the plaintiff-mortgagee in possession. That Court also found that the persons alleged to be prior mortgagees had no concern with the property and were not in fact prior mortgagees, and that the plaintiff had no cause of action against his mortgagors.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI, J.—The plaintiff is a usufructuary mortgagee from the respondents of certain lands in the cultivation of tenants. The plaintiff sued some of the tenants for recovery of rent in a Court of Revenue. The tenants pleaded payment to defendants Nos. 6 and 7, who alleged themselves to be prior mortgagees of the land. They succeeded, and the suit for rent was dismissed. Thereupon the present suit was brought by the plaintiff, against his mortgagors, for possession of the mortgaged land and, in the [193] alternative, for recovery of the mortgage money. The lower appellate Court found that the mortgagors had done all they could to put the mortgagee into possession, and had not interfered with his possession, that the persons who alleged themselves to be prior mortgagees had no concern with the property and were not in fact prior mortgagees, and that the plaintiff had no cause of action against his mortgagors. On this ground the lower appellate Court has dismissed the claim against the mortgagors. It is contended here that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the mortgage money under clauses (b) and (c) of s. 68 of Act No. IV of 1882. Clause (b) has no application, as upon the finding of the Court below the mortgagee has not been deprived of the mortgaged property by or in consequence of the wrongful act or default of the mortgagor. Clause (c) also is, in my opinion, of no avail to the plaintiff. The mortgagors did not fail to deliver possession to the plaintiff. It is urged that they failed to secure possession without disturbance by any person other than the mortgagors. As held by the Madras High Court in Gopalasami v. Arunachella (1), the words "any other person" in the concluding portion of clause (c) must be held to mean any other person having a title. If a trespasser disturbs the possession of the mortgagee, that certainly cannot confer any right on him to ask the mortgagor to pay the mortgage money. In this case the tenants of the mortgaged property, who had to pay rent to the mortgagee, wrongfully refused to do so, and, if any one disturbed the possession of the mortgagee, it was the persons who falsely alleged themselves to be prior mortgagees, and not the mortgagors. Surely the mortgagor cannot be held responsible for the acts of others with whom he is not in collusion or who have no title to the property mortgaged by the mortgagor. The suit has in my judgment been properly dismissed. I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Execution of decree—Civil Procedure Code, s. 396—Powers of Court executing a decree for partition.

Held, that a Court has no power under s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure to order its amin to cause a wall to be built separating portions of property of which partition has been decreed.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—Hardeo Sahai brought a suit for partition of houses and shops against Sohan Lal. A decree for partition was made. By direction of the Court the plaintiff prepared two lots. The defendant was allowed to select which of these two lots he would take. The defendant selected one lot; the plaintiff took the other. The amin put the parties in possession of their lots. Thereupon, it appears to us, the suit terminated. There was the decree, and there was execution complete. Afterwards the plaintiff came into Court and asked the Court to direct the amin to build a wall between his lot and the defendant's lot. The Court directed the amin to build a wall. The wall was built. The defendant objected to the jurisdiction of the Court to make any such order, and to the wall as having encroached on his land and as having excluded him from a portion of the land allotted to him. The Court dismissed the objection, and from that order of dismissal this appeal has been brought.

For the defendant-appellant it has been contended that the Court had no longer jurisdiction after making its decree and order allotting the portion selected by the defendant to him and the portion left to the plaintiff. He also contended that, even if the jurisdiction of the Court was not then determined, the Court has [195] no jurisdiction to direct a wall to be built, and that its order in that respect was in any event ultra vires.

On behalf of the plaintiff-respondent it has been contended that the Court has power under s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure to order a wall to be built, and reliance is placed upon the third paragraph of s. 396. It is contended that the "bounds" therein mentioned would include the building of a wall.

We are not aware that the Court has any power in a partition suit to direct an officer of the Court to have a wall built in carrying out the partition. There is nothing in s. 396 to suggest that a Court has any such authority. The "metes and bounds" mentioned in the third paragraph of s. 396 are merely the measurements and the limits of the shares which may be mentioned in the commissioners' report. "Bounds" there do not mean a wall to be built. If that was the meaning of the words of that section, the wall would have to be built in the report, and when the commissioners differed two walls would have to be built, each in a separate report. It would be inconvenient, if not dangerous to the rights of the parties, that a Court should have power to order its officer to have a wall built in a partition suit. Suppose the officer made a mistake and built a wall on the defendant's land instead of on the plaintiff's, what remedy would there be? What could the defendant do with the wall? He could not cart it away and put it upon anyone else's land, and the materials would be an obstruction on his own land. He would have no action against the plaintiff, as the wall was not built by the plaintiff, but by the Court Amin under the orders of the Court. The defendant might complain that he did not want the wall and did not see why a wall should be built on his land for the amusement of the plaintiff. He might very reasonably say that, if the plaintiff wanted a wall built between them, the plaintiff was at liberty to build a wall on his own land, so long as he did not interfere with any rights or other easement which the defendant had obtained on partition. It is much safer to leave the person who can be answerable in a suit for trespass, or interference with an easement, to build a wall [196] at his own risk than for the Court to instruct its Amin to commit what may be an act of trespass.

We allow the objection to this extent that we hold that the Court had no authority to order the Amin to build the wall and that its order in that respect was ultra vires: to this extent we allow this appeal with costs.

Appeal decreed in part.

LATE
CIVIL.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of BANERJI, J.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the appellant.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

19 A. 196 = BANERJI, J.—This was a suit for sale under a mortgage which 17 A.W.N. comprised two items of property, namely, a piece of homestead land and (1897) 18. a shop. The mortgagee held a simple decree for money against the mortgagor, in execution of which he caused the land and a two-thirds share in the shop to be sold by auction subject to his mortgage. He himself purchased the land, and the share in the shop was purchased by the defendant No. 5, who subsequently sold it to the defendants Nos. 3 and 4.
The remaining one-third [197] share was sold afterwards to the second defendant by the first defendant, the mortgagor.

In the present suit the plaintiff mortgagee has made an apportionment of the mortgage money with reference to what he alleges to be the value of the two items of property mortgaged to him, and, after making a deduction of what according to him was chargeable on the property purchased by him, has claimed the balance and has prayed for the sale of the mortgaged property for realization of the balance.

Both the Courts below have dismissed the suit on the ground that the purchase of a part of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee subject to his mortgage had the effect of discharging the whole mortgage. They have relied on several rulings, of which I need only refer to Ahmad Wali
v. Bakar Husain (1) and Ballam Das v. Amar Raj (2).

There can be no doubt that a mortgagee who purchases a portion of the mortgaged property cannot be allowed to throw the whole burden of the mortgage debt on the remainder of the property. The whole of the property mortgaged being liable for the debt, the liability of each portion of it is proportionate to its value; and ordinarily the persons who purchase the different portions of the property are inter se liable in proportion to the part purchased by each of them. Where, however, the mortgagee himself purchases at auction a portion of the mortgaged property which is sold subject to his mortgage, the case becomes different. Such purchase has in some instances the effect of discharging the whole of the mortgage debt, but I am unable to hold that it has that effect in every case, however insignificant the portion purchased may be, and whatever value may have been paid for it. If two properties, one of very small value and the other of large value, be mortgaged to secure re-payment of one debt, and the value of the property of small value be less than the amount of the mortgage, the purchase of that property by the mortgagee cannot be held to satisfy the mortgage in full. The reason is obvious. Had such property not [198] been purchased by the mortgagee and were it to be sold in satisfaction of the mortgage debt, only that portion of the mortgage amount would be realized by the sale as would be represented by the value of the property; and not the whole of mortgage debt. If, for example, that property is worth Rs. 5, that amount only can be realized by the sale of it, and the mortgage money can be satisfied to the extent of Rs. 5 only. The purchase of such property by the mortgagee cannot make any difference so far as the question of the satisfaction of the mortgage debt is concerned. Where, on the other hand, the portion of the mortgaged property purchased by the mortgagee is of a value higher than the amount of the mortgage, and the difference between that value and the price paid by the mortgagee is equal to or exceeds the amount of the mortgage, the purchase has the effect of fully discharging the mortgage. For in such a case the mortgagee cannot in equity be allowed to benefit by his purchase, and, whilst retaining in his own hands so much of the actual value of the property as is represented by the amount of the mortgage, to realise that amount by a sale of the remainder of the mortgaged property. If, however, the mortgagee has paid for the property its full value, that is, the value which it would have fetched had it been sold as unincumbered property, the mortgagor or any other person holding the remainder of the mortgaged property has not at all been damnified, and the property other than that purchased by the mortgagee must be held liable for a proportionate part of the mortgage money. Similarly, if the property purchased by the mortgagee is of a value smaller than the amount of the mortgage and the mortgagee has paid for it its full value, the remainder of the mortgaged property must contribute the proportion of the mortgage debt chargeable on it. If, in the case of such property, the price paid by the mortgagee is less than the full value, the difference must be held to discharge the mortgage pro tanto. It is true that, when property is sold by auction subject to a mortgage, the price ordinarily paid for it is less than its real value by the amount of the mortgage, as the purchaser renders himself liable to discharge the mortgage debt. [199] The extent of his liability, however, cannot be greater than the amount for which the property could have been sold had it not been sold subject to the mortgage, for, as I have said above, it is to the extent of that amount only that the mortgage would have been discharged by the sale. To hold that every purchase by the mortgagee of a portion of the mortgaged property discharges the mortgage in full would lead to iniquitous results. If, as I have pointed out above, the property purchased by the mortgagee was of the value of Rs. 5 only, and only Rs. 5 out of the mortgage money could possibly be realized by the sale of that property, it cannot by any stretch of reasoning be said that, by reason of the purchase of that property by the mortgagee, the whole of the mortgage debt exceeding Rs. 5 has been discharged. In the case of Ballam Das v. Amar Raj and another (1), the value of the property sold was more than the amount of the two decrees held by the mortgagee purchaser. That case is therefore consistent with what I have said above. In Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (2), the proposition was laid down somewhat broadly if the value of the property sold was less than the amount of the mortgage debt, but we have no reason to assume that such was the case. The view which I have taken of the question was adopted and acted upon in Sumeru Kuar v. Bhagwant Singh (3).

(1) 9 A. W. N. (1883) 61.

(2) 12 A. 587.

The Courts below have, in my judgment, dismissed the suit on insufficient grounds. The plaintiff stated that the value of the property purchased by him satisfied the mortgage to the extent of Rs. 49 only out of the principal, while the defendant averred that it was much more. These questions ought to have been gone into.

I allow the appeal, and, setting aside the decrees below, remand the case under s 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of first instance with directions to readmit it under its original number in the register, and try it on the merits in advertence to the above remarks. Costs to abide the result.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the order of BLAIR, J. Maulvi Muhammad Ishaq, for the applicant.

The Government Pleader (Munshi Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

ORDER.

BLAIR, J.—This is a petition for the revision of an order of the Sessions Judge of Ghazipur, directing the prosecution of the applicant for an offence under s. 193 of the Indian Penal Code. The applicant had been put upon his trial before a Magistrate of the first class for an offence constituted by s. 323 of the Indian Penal Code. He had been convicted and sentenced to pay a fine of Rs. 25, or, in default of such payment, to be imprisoned for three months. Application was made by him to the Sessions Judge to revise this sentence and conviction. This application was to some extent based upon the allegation that the Magistrate, who tried the case, had refused to summon witnesses whom the applicant desired to call in his defence. That allegation in the petition was supported by an affidavit sworn by the applicant. The Sessions Judge found that the allegations of that affidavit were false to the knowledge of its maker, and therefore made the order now sought to be revised.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq for the applicant contends that such an order is bad in law, inasmuch as the applicant, who made the [201] affidavit, occupied at the time of such making the status of an accused person. The object, he contended, of the application and the affidavit were to obtain a reversal or modification of the conviction and sentence. It is not disputed that the applicant was incapable in law of being examined, otherwise than under the circumstances and restrictions set forth in s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, upon the original hearing of the case against him. He could not have been called as a witness, either by the prosecution to establish their case, or by himself in his own defence. It is argued that the reason of such disqualification extends to proceedings outside the original trial which may be taken for the purpose of reversing or modifying its result. I confess, I myself am unable to see why the reasons for which the Legislature excluded an accused person from giving evidence upon an original trial should not operate with equal force to preclude his competency as a witness in the appeal from that trial, and I am referred to a case Queen-Empress v. Subhayya (1) in which the High Court at Madras so held.

* Criminal Revision No. 664 of 1896.

(1) 12 M. 451.

Munshi Ram Prasad, Government Pleader, calls attention to the not unusual practice of supporting applications for transfers of cases against accused persons being supported by affidavits made by such persons, but he does not cite any authority or even suggest any practice by which, either in matters of appeals or applications for revision, affidavits have been received made by the person who has been convicted and sentenced upon the original trial.

For my own part, I have no doubt that the Legislature intended to protect an accused person from the ordeal of examination as a witness and to render him incapable, therefore, of being punished for the making of false statements upon oath, or otherwise, so long as his case is sub judice. I accede to the contention that there is no substantial difference between the position of a person accused and convicted, supporting by his own evidence a criminal appeal, and a case of an accused person desiring to defend himself by his oath in an original criminal trial. Still less am I able to draw [202] any distinction in this respect between the position of a petitioner in appeal and a petitioner in revision. The object is the same, to revise or modify the action of the Court below, and every reason, which would render it not desirable for a petitioner in appeal to be a competent and compellable witness, applies with equal force in revisional proceedings. Following, therefore, in principle the satisfactory ruling cited above, I grant this petition in revision and set aside the order of the District Judge by which it is sought by criminal proceedings to inflict legal penalties for the taking of a false oath under circumstances which render the person so to be charged incompetent to be put upon his oath at all.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—In 1876 one Muhammad Husain mortgaged with possession a five-biswa share in a village named Sajauli to one Bahauddin. The terms of the mortgage were that the period should be for six years ; that the money advanced, namely Rs. 1,000, might be repaid on the expiry of six years ; and that, on repayment of that money together with any arrears of rent due by tenants at that time, the mortgagor should have redemption. The mortgage was usufructuary only so far as interest was concerned, the usufruct being taken instead of interest. We mention the fact, although we do not think that the principle which must guide us in this case would be affected by the fact of the mortgage being wholly or partially usufructuary. Muhammad Husain brought a suit for redemption after the expiration of six years and obtained a decree for redemption in February 1884. The decree did not comply with s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act in that it did not specify what should take place in case the mortgage money was not paid within the period limited in that respect. The mortgage money was not paid either then or at all. Under that decree the mortgagee did not apply for an order under s. 93 of the Transfer of Property Act. The plaintiff in this suit, having a decree for money against Muhammad Husain, brought Muhammad Husain's interest in the mortgaged premises to sale, and at the auction sale purchased that interest. That was subsequently to the decree for redemption. The plaintiff has now brought a suit to redeem the mortgage of 1876. The first Court decreed the claim. The District Judge in appeal dismissed the suit, holding that the suit was barred by s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff has brought this appeal.

Pandit Sundar Lal has contended on behalf of the appellant that in a suit for redemption, when the decree does not provide for the event of the redemption money not being paid within the time limited, the mortgagor or his assignee, as soon as the decree for redemption becomes time-barred by reason of limitation, is [204] entitled to bring a fresh suit for redemption. It is contended that, in cases where the mortgage is usufructuary, a decree in a suit for redemption which does not provide what shall be done in the event of the money not being paid is merely of the character of a declaratory decree and would not preclude a second suit, and that argument was supported by certain authorities. The earliest of those authorities is Sami Achari v. Somasundram Achari (1). That case was followed in Periandi v. Angappa (2). Those cases, if good law, would entirely support Pandit Sundar Lal's contention. It appears to us that, if those cases are good law, a mortgagor is only limited as to the number of suits which he may bring to redeem the same mortgage by the length of his life or by the sixty years provided by the Limitation Act. Those cases were followed apparently in Ramunni v. Brahma Dattan (1). It appears to us that the view of the law to be found in those cases is not supported by the law as administered in such matters in England, or by the law as enacted in the Code of Civil Procedure, or the Transfer of Property Act. No doubt the Transfer of Property Act was passed after the two first cases had arisen and been decided. Pandit Sundar Lal also relied upon the decision of this Court in Muhammad Sami-ud-din Khan v. Mannu Lal (2). It appears to us that the decision in that case was contrary to the decision of the Full Bench of this Court, and further that the decision was wrong, and also that the lesson to be learnt from the Transfer of Property Act is that such a suit as this could not be maintained. In our opinion the decision of the Full Bench in Sheikh Golam Hoosein v. Musumat Alla Rukhee Beebee (3), was not affected by the Transfer of Property Act, and is in harmony with that Act and is perfectly sound law. This question has been considered by the High Court at Bombay in Maloji v. Sagaji (4), and if we may say so, we entirely agree with the view of the law on this point expressed in that case. The precise point does not appear to have been decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Hari [205] Ravji Chiplunkar v. Shapurji Hormasji Shet (5), but there is nothing in the judgment of their Lordships in that case to encourage the opinion that, where a decree for redemption has been obtained, the mortgagor can bring a second suit for redemption. In our opinion it was the intention of the Legislature, as expressed in ss. 92 and 93 of the Transfer of Property Act, that there should be one suit only for redemption. We further think that the allowance of a second suit for redemption would be to go contrary to the principle of s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and that the fact that a mortgagor has failed to comply with his decree for redemption within time cannot give him a fresh cause of action. His original cause of action for redemption, it appears to us, was extinguished. It also appears to us that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure would preclude a second suit upon the same cause of action. We dismiss this appeal with costs. [Which will include fees on the higher scale]. (6)

(1) 6 M. 119.

(2) 7 M. 423.

(3) 15 M. 366.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—The Maharaja of Bhurtpur brought a suit for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. The mortgage included several villages, and we infer [206] from the judgment and decree in the case that various amounts were charged upon the various villages as the liabilities of the particular villages. The Maharaja obtained a decree for sale under s. 88. The decree specified the amount for which each village was liable. After that decree had been obtained, one Chunni Lal obtained from the representative of the mortgagor a mortgage with possession of three of the villages. The Maharaja of Bhurtpur put his decree in execution, and obtained an order for the sale of the three villages, in question. That order was made under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act. It is true that the order did not say that it was an order absolute, but the order under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act is an order for sale in execution, as was held by the Full Bench of this Court. Afterwards Chunni Lal put in a petition asking that the mortgagee should be directed to receive from him the amount decreed against these particular villages and be ordered to abstain from bringing the villages to sale, but did not tender to the mortgagee or bring into Court the amount decreed against these particular villages. We have asked under what section that application was made. It could not have been made under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act. The day fixed for payment had passed and s. 89 unlike ss. 87 and 93 of the same Act, gives the Court no power to extend the time for payment on good cause shown. The Subordinate Judge, however, made an order in the terms of the prayer which had the effect of postponing the sale, and from that order this appeal has been brought.

We are told by the vakil for Chunni Lal, but it is not admitted on behalf of the mortgagee, and we do not know if it is the case or not, that after the order was made the amount decreed against these villages was paid into Court. We need not consider that question. S. 89 provides what is to happen in case the amount is paid on or before the day for payment, and as to what is to happen "if such payment is not so made." If such payment is not so made, the plaintiff can apply for an order for sale, and the Court shall then pass an order that such property, or a [207] sufficient part thereof, be sold, and that the proceeds of the sale be dealt with as is mentioned in s. 88, and "thereupon the defendant's right to redeem and the security shall both be extinguished." It is quite clear that the Court had no power under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, to extend the time within which payment of the debt and costs might be made. The Legislature must intentionally have omitted to give that power in s. 89 which it had expressly given in ss. 87 and 93. We have had to consider this group of sections in the following cases:—Amolak

Ram v. Lachmi Narain ; Ram Lal v. Tulsa Kuar, and Kashi Prasad v. Sheo Sahai (1).

It is contended by Mr. Baldeo Ram for Chunni Lal that s. 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, applied in this case and enabled Chunni Lal to have the sale stopped upon payment into Court of the debt and costs. It is hardly necessary for us to decide whether that section would apply or not, as at the time when the order under appeal was made the debt and costs had not been paid into Court or to the mortgagee. But, although what we are about to say is under the circumstances obiter, it is better that we should, for the guidance of Subordinate Courts in these Provinces, express our opinion as to the application of s. 291 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882, to a case in which under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, an order absolute for sale has been made.

It is clear that, when such an order for sale has been made under s. 89, the defendant's right to redeem is by that section extinguished. The Transfer of Property Act, 1882 (Act No. IV of 1882), received the assent of the Governor-General on the 17th of February 1882, and came into force on the 1st of July in the same year. Act No. XIV of 1882 (the Code of Civil Procedure, 1882) received the assent of the Governor-General on the 17th of March 1882, and came into force on the 1st of June in the same year. The only procedure provided by the Legislature for the conducting of sales under decrees of Civil Courts is that which [208] is contained in the Code of Civil Procedure, and, although it may appear an anomaly that a Code which deals merely with procedure should in effect in a certain event give not only a right to redeem, but actual redemption, to a mortgagor whose right to redeem had been extinguished by the express enactment of the Legislature dealing with decrees for sale, and although in such cases s. 89 of Act No. IV of 1882 and s. 291 of Act No. XIV of 1882 are in conflict, it appears to us that we would be bound to hold that s. 291 of Act No. XIV of 1882 must be taken to have modified in that respect s. 89 of Act No. IV of 1882 when the debt and costs (including the costs of the sale) are tendered to the officer conducting the sale, or when it is proved to his satisfaction that the amount of such debt and costs had been paid into the Court that ordered the sale. It may be that s. 310-A of Act No. XIV of 1882 and the sections of that Act under which the execution of a decree is transferred from the Civil Court to the Collector further modify the concluding provisions of s. 89 of Act No. IV of 1882. In our view of the law Chunni Lal, being a mortgagee, although his title arose subsequently to the decree for sale, could have availed himself of any right which his mortgagor had after the making of the decree and of the order for sale, and could have paid into Court the amount payable under the decree for sale and any costs which the Court might by an order under s. 94 of Act No. IV of 1882 add to the mortgage-money, and thus stop the sale; but he did not adopt that course. The course which he adopted was one which might result in the indefinite postponement of the satisfaction of the decretal debt, and it is to be remembered that the Court not having the power to impose terms as a condition of postponing the day appointed for payment, as it might if the case were one to which s. 87 or s. 93 of Act No. IV of 1882 applied, could not protect the mortgagee decree-holder from loss by making it a condition of a postponement that Chunni Lal should pay interest on the decretal amount.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRESENT :

Lords Watson, Hobhouse and Morris and Sir R. Couch.

[On petition from the High Court at Allahabad.]

LALTA PRASAD AND OTHERS (Petitioners) v. SHEIKH AZIZ-UD-DIN
AND OTHERS (Objectors).^{*} [21st November, 1896.]

Alleged want of notice to respondent—Appeal heard ex parte—Practice.

There is no rule, among those made by the High Court under the authority of law, that the respondent in an appeal to the Queen in Council shall receive formal notice of the transmission of the record of the appeal, of the dependency whereof he has had notice.

The mere allegation that the respondents in this appeal had, in consequence of their having had no express notice that the appeal had been set down for hearing, allowed the hearing of the appeal to take place ex parte was not considered sufficient to entitle them to a re-hearing thereof.

THIS was a petition filed on the 28th May 1896 for the rehearing of an appeal heard by the Judicial Committee in 1895, according to whose opinion by order in Council (5th August 1895) the appeal was allowed, the decree of the High Court (1st March 1891) was reversed, and it was directed that judgment for the appellants should be entered.

The petition alleged that the hearing had been ex parte; that no notice had been received by the respondents, or their agents, of the transmission of the record to the office of the Privy Council; and that no notice had been given to them that the appeal had been set down for hearing, of which they first heard on the 29th August 1895. Had they known beforehand, they would have appeared in support of the High Court's judgment.

[210] Mr. Sydney Hastings, for the petitioners, relied on affidavits, affirmed and attested at Bareilly on the 18th December 1895, by two brothers, respondents in the appeal. They stated that the first notice which they had of the appeal having gone to England was through a report of it in an Indian newspaper published on August 20th, 1895. They knew that the appeal was pending, and were not, according to the rules, entitled to have every step formally notified to them. But, as the facts were, an order was made by the Judicial Committee calling on the respondents to appear on the 22nd March 1895, and, afterwards, a confirmatory order was issued; but neither of those orders reached the respondents.

The case of Mussumat Ranee Surnomoyee v. Shooshee Mokhee Burmonia (1) was distinguishable: that was a case of negligence of the party not appearing. Here, the respondents, according to the affidavits, would have appeared had they known that the hearing was coming on.

(1) 12 M.I.A. 244 (254).

It was submitted that the appellant should have given notice to the respondent.

[Their Lordships referred to the rules in force in the High Court made under the Code of Civil Procedure. They also heard a statement in Court, from the Deputy Registrar, to the effect that the letters sent from England, acknowledging the transmission of the records, contained intimation that the appellants should proceed with the appeal within six months, and that the practice was for the Registrar of the High Court to let the parties know this. In every case there was a period, more or less long, during which the record was being prepared, and with this preparation the Registrar of the High Court could not go on without the parties on both sides, or their representatives, being informed with a view to their presence. The vakils, on either side, in the High Court, could inspect the record.]

Counsel for the petitioners continued. It was no part of the case that the parties had not, by their vakil, inspected the record. But the present contention was that the peremptory order made [211] and issued by this Committee on the 24th March was meant to reach the respondents. It had not reached them. They, therefore, might have supposed that the date of the hearing was not yet, and had not been fixed. The real ground of this application was that, this case having been heard ex parte, there was evidence that the respondents did not receive, as it was meant that they should receive, intimation of the day of the hearing. From the issue of the order to appear on the 22nd March, and the confirmatory order following it, there was ground for assuming that notice was intended to be given.

Mr. Herbert Cowell, for the objectors, was not heard.

OPINION.

Their Lordships intimated that, in their opinion, the petitioners had sufficient notice. No formal notice was required by the rules of the High Court of the transmission of the appeal. The petition was dismissed with costs.

Solicitor for the petitioners : Mr. R. M. Turnbull.

19 A. 211 = [212] THIS was a suit for a declaration that certain property which the father of the plaintiffs had mortgaged to the defendant, and for the sale of which the defendant had obtained a decree, was waqf property. 17 A.W.N. (1897) 49. The plaintiffs alleged that their ancestor, Basharat Khan, had dedicated the property in suit for the performance of certain ceremonies known as fateha and kadam sharif.

The defendant pleaded, inter alia, that the dedication of the property for the purposes alleged was an illusory dedication, inasmuch as the ceremonies in question involved no substantial expenditure, and that the so-called waqf was merely a pretext for an attempt to prevent the property from being alienated.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Bareilly) found as to the principal issue in the case that the proportion of the income of the so-called endowed villages which would be expended on the ceremonies of fateha and kadam sharif was very small compared with the total income, and that the descendants of Basharat Khan had up to the present never treated the property as endowed property, and it dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Bareilly), finding that the document relied upon by the plaintiffs did operate to create a valid waqf, decreed the appeal and the plaintiffs' suit.

The defendant vendee appealed to the High Court, and, on the appeal coming on for hearing on the 18th of November 1895, certain issues, which are stated in the judgment of the Court, were referred under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Mr. Abdul Majid, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR and BANERJI, JJ.—In this second appeal the Court below has returned findings in answer to the questions put by us in a remand order framed under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The first question we asked was :—

What was the income of the whole property dealt with by Basharat Khan in the deed of 1781 at the date of the document?

[213] The finding in reply is :—That the income of the whole property average Rs. 850 per annum at the date of the disposition.

The second was :—What was the amount of expenditure required for the expenses connected with the fateha, also those connected with the kadam sharif, having regard to the means and position in life of the maker of that deed?

The finding on that point is :—That such expenditure would amount to Rs. 500 per annum.

The third and fourth issues are as follows :—

(1) 17 C. 498.

(2) 22 I.A. 76.

Does the ceremony of the fateha involve necessarily and essentially any distribution of alms and kindred charity among the poor? Do the ceremonies and expenses connected with the kadam sharif necessarily and essentially involve the distribution of alms or kindred charity among the poor?

The finding is that "under the Muhammadan ecclesiastical law it is not binding to distribute alms or to make any kindred charity in connection with fateha and kadam sharif; but, according to the custom which prevails in the country, the distribution of sweetmeats and other eatables to the poor and other visitors has become an integral part of the ceremony connected with fateha. The ziarat of kadam sharif when held alone by itself does not necessarily involve the distribution of alms or kindred charity."

On these findings we are asked by Mr. Amir-ud-din to decree this appeal. He contends that the document which we have to construe must be interpreted by express Muhammadan law. He alleges correctly that the contention between himself and Mr. Abdul Majid for the respondent was conducted on this basis, and the memorandum of appeal put forward one basis, and one only, that on the plain construction of the document the case set up was that, under the Muhammadan law, the fateha and kadam sharif both necessarily involved charitable expenditure. Mr. Amir-ud-din asked us on this ground to decline to bring to bear on the interpretation of the document any finding of custom.

He suggests also, and in this respect we are unable to follow him, that the finding of custom by the lower Court does not extend [214] to the period at which the alleged waqf was made. That we have a right to interpret the intention of a waqif by reference to the custom prevailing at the time when the waqf was made we have no doubt. We have the express authority of the Privy Council in the case of Mahomed Ahsanulla Chowdhry v. Amarchand Kundu (1) for using such custom to discover the intention of a grantor. Their Lordships say:—"If indeed it were shown that the customary uses were of such magnitude as to exhaust the income, or to absorb the bulk of it, such a circumstance would have its weight in ascertaining the intention of the grantor." We have the same case, which was also referred to in Abul Fata Mahomed Ishak v. Russomoy Dhur Chowdhry (2), as an authority for the proposition that, according to Muhammadan law, no gift is good as a waqf unless there is a substantial dedication of the property to charitable uses at some period of time; and that pronouncement must be taken as an authority for the converse proposition, that, when there is a substantial dedication of the property to charitable uses, the document making such dedication is a good waqf. We have findings as to the expenditure upon charitable uses to the effect that something like Rs. 500 annually is spent upon them, and we have the finding as to custom by the light of which we can reasonably conclude that the grantor intended the income of his property to be spent in accordance with what is found to be the custom.

We hold, therefore, that the document providing a substantial and not illusory expenditure out of the settled property is a good waqf according to the doctrine of Muhammadan law. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SUBA SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. SARAFRAZ KUNWAR AND OTHERS (Defendants).^{*} [23rd December, 1896.]

Hindu Law—Mitakshara—Succession—Whole blood and half blood—Distinction between whole blood and half blood not confined to brothers and their sons.

The distinction of whole blood and half blood applies, according to the rule of succession of the Mitakshara, founded on propinquity of blood, to sapinda relations other than the brother and his sons. Simat v. Amra (1) not followed.

[Not F., 24 B. 317 ; F., 13 M.L.T. 445 (448) = (1913) M.W.N. 448 (450) ; Appr., 6 C.L.J. 190 (204) ; R., 24 A. 128 (131) ; 20 M. 342 (347) ; 33 M. 439 (444) = 20 M.L.J. 275 = 7 M.L.T. 203 (206) = 5 Ind. Cas. 280 (282) ; D., 32 A. 541 (544) = 7 A.L.J. 560 (564) = 6 Ind. Cas. 364 (365).]

THIS was a reference to a Full Bench. The facts out of which the question referred arose are fully stated in the following order of Burkitt, J., in which Blair, J., concurred.

BURKITT, J.—The dispute between the parties in this case is as to their respective rights to succeed to the property left by one Nageshar. The subjoined genealogical table shows the relationship between the members of the family.

All the persons mentioned in this table are descendants of a common ancestor, one Ganga Bakhsh, who was great-great-grandfather of Nageshar.

[216] Ganga Bakhsh had three sons, from one of whom (Anand) Nageshar was descended. Anand's line has now failed. Consequently the person entitled to Nageshar's property has to be sought in the lines of Ganga Bakhsh's other two sons Ahlad and Bhagwant. Ahlad's line is now represented by the four plaintiffs Subha, Janga, Sarab Dawan, and Naurang. Of Bhagwant's line the only person now left in the same degree of descent from the common ancestor as the four persons last mentioned is the defendant Jawahir who is grandson of Bhagwant, as the plaintiffs are grandsons of Ahlad. One Kaulban, a brother of Jawahir, who also was impleaded as defendant, died childless since this appeal was instituted. I have, therefore, omitted him from the genealogy. Two others of the defendants of Ganga Bakhsh, namely Bisheshar and Sheo Narain, have also been made defendants. But as they are one degree more remote in descent from the common ancestor than the plaintiffs and Jawahir, and as the important question in this appeal does not affect them, I have put their names in italics in the table.

Now, as the deceased Nageshar was not a member of a joint undivided family, the plaintiffs and the defendant Jawahir, being in the same degree of descent from the common ancestor, would under the ordinary Hindu Law be entitled to succeed to Nageshar's property, each taking an equal share per capita. But it is alleged (and on the evidence we have no doubt that the allegation is true), that the common ancestor Ganga Bakhsh had two wives, that his sons Bhagwant and Anand were born of one of those wives, while Ablad was the son of the other. As, then, the property in dispute is that which was of Nageshar and as the defendant Jawahir descends from the same wife of Ganga Bakhsh as Nageshar, it is contended that the plaintiffs, who descend from the other wife of Ganga Bakhsh, are excluded by Jawahir, they being only of the half blood. Now, this distinction of the half blood does under the Mitakshara in the Benares School obtain in the case of brothers. There can be no doubt that brothers of the whole blood do exclude brothers of the half blood. Also, in the [217] case of nephews, if there be no brothers, those of the full blood exclude those of the half blood. But, even in the case of brothers and of nephews, the distinction is not carried very far, for it is admitted that a brother of the half blood would exclude a nephew of the full blood. And, in the present case, it is admitted that, if the plaintiffs were even one degree nearer the common ancestor than Jawahir, they would exclude him, notwithstanding that they are of the half blood. This is a point which should not be left out of sight in considering the question which is raised in this case. For the plaintiffs it is contended that in cases governed by the Mitakshara the preference of the whole blood over the half blood is limited to the case of brothers and nephews. The defendant Jawahir, on the other hand, contends that that preference extends all through the Gotraja Sapindas down to the most remote.

The lower Court is of opinion that the principle of the exclusion of the half blood is not restricted to brothers and their sons, and has given Jawahir a decree for the whole of the property left by Nageshar. Hence this appeal.

On this question both Mr. Mayne (paragraph 529, 4th Edition), and West and Buhler (paragraph 125, 3rd Edition) are of opinion that the distinction between the whole blood and the half blood does not extend to the more distant relationships, i.e., to the descendants of the grandfather and of remoter ascendants. But the only authority cited by those learned commentators — (and indeed the only case on the subject in the reports) — is the one case of Samat v. Amra (1). In that case it was held that, as the plaintiffs though of the half blood were one degree nearer to the common ancestor than some of the defendants and two degrees nearer than others, they were not excluded by the defendants. For the respondent Jawahir it was argued by Mr. Conlan that the case of Samat v. Amra really does not affect the question inasmuch as, as already stated, it is admitted in the present case that, if either of the parties whether of the whole or the half blood were one degree nearer to the [218] common ancestor, that party would take in preference to the other. But on a close examination that case appears to me to have more weight than Mr. Conlan would attribute to it. In the Mayukha brothers of the half blood have a much lower place in the line of succession than in the Mitakshara. According to the latter, half brothers come in next after full brothers, and are preferred to nephews of the full blood, while in the Mayukha half brothers are postponed not merely to full brothers, but also to full brother's sons, to the paternal grandmother and to the sister, and only come in along with the paternal grandfather. Thus, according to the table on page 205 of the Vyavastha Chandrika (translation by Soama Charan Sarkar, 1878) while half brothers are No. 12 in the order of succession in the Benares School, they are relegated to No. 15 in the Mahratta School. From the judgment in the case of Samat v. Amra (1) it is clear that this most important variation between the two schools was present to the minds of the learned Judges who decided that case. Nevertheless they held that "neither the Mitakshara nor the Mayukha makes any distinction between persons of the whole blood and persons of the half blood except in the case of brothers and sons of brothers." So whatever authority there is favours the appellant's contention.

For the appellant it was argued by Pandit Moti Lal that the Bombay decision is right and that the lower Court had incorrectly decided the matter in issue on the ground of propinquity, the respondent being nearer of kin to Nag-shar through his remote female ancestor. He contended that the rule as to half and full brothers first appears in the Mitakshara, is not to be found in Yajnavalkya and was founded on the text from Manu "to the nearest Sapinda the inheritance belongs," but urged that the propinquity theory is not recognised after the third degree. He admitted that, where no order of succession is laid down in the Mitakshara, general principles might be applied, but contended that as to the succession of Gotraja Sapindas it lays down an exhaustive line. And he further pointed out that, where there was room for [219] doubt, the Mitakshara was particular to specify the order of the succession, e.g., in placing the mother before the father, in the distinction between the classes of daughters, and in this case of half and full brothers. From this it was contended that had the author of the Mitakshara desired to indicate any distinction between gentiles of the whole and of the half blood, he no doubt would have done so and that the Mitakshara, though perhaps not exhaustive on every matter, always expresses any distinction which was to be drawn between two competing heirs of the same class. And also on the authority of Bhya Ram Singh v. Bhya Ugar Singh (2) it was contended that, as the spiritual advantages which the appellants and the respondents could confer on the propositus would be equal, they were equally entitled to the inheritance.

For the respondent it was contended by Mr. Conlan that the policy of the Mitakshara is that the order of succession is to be determined by propinquity to the propositus as shown by the text from Manu,—“to the nearest Sapinda the inheritance belongs.” The text, he argued, shows that propinquity as furnishing a rule of succession is not confined to Sapindas only, but extends to Samanodaks also, and that propinquity springs from the mother, the greatest propinquity being between those who are descended from a common mother. The learned counsel further added that the Mitakshara rule of succession is based on consanguinity and not on any religious considerations of spiritual benefits, therein differing from the Dayabhaga, and finally contended that the true construction of the Mitakshara was that the preference of the whole over the half blood extended throughout the whole line of gentile succession.

(1) 6 B. 394.

(2) 13 M.I.A. 373.

The question thus raised, and most ably argued before us, is an interesting and not an unimportant point in the Hindu Law of succession. I think it ought to be laid for decision before a larger number of Judges. If my learned brother consent, I would refer the following question for the consideration and a determination of a Full Bench, namely,—“Does the distinction between the whole [220] blood and the half blood, observed in the case of the brothers and their sons, extend to the descendants of the grand-father and of remoter ascendants; and, if so, how far?”

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya (with whom Pandit Moti Lal), for the appellants, contended that in cases governed by the Mitakshara the preference of the whole blood is limited to brothers and their sons. He referred to the following authorities:—Manu, Chap. IX, ss. 186 and 187, Sacred Books of the East, Vol. XXV, p. 336; Yajnavalkya, Chap. 2, ss. 135 and 136, Mandlik, p. 220; Mitakshara, Chap. 1, s. 4, v. 5, and Chap. II, s. 5; Smriti Chandrika, Chap. Pandit Sundar Lal (with whom were Mr. T. The enumeration of heirs in the Mitakshara was not exhaustive. He relied on the following authorities:—Mitakshara, Chap. ii, s. 3, vv. 3, 4 and 5; *Lallubhai Bapubhai v. The following judgments were delivered:—

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, J.—The question which has been referred to us for decision is thus set out in the referring order of the 26th of February 1895.

"Does the distinction between the whole blood and the half blood observed in the case of brothers and their sons extend to the descendants of the grandfathers and of remoter ascendants; and, if so, how far?"

[222] The distinction referred to is a preferential right to succeed to the inheritance of property left by a deceased member of the family, that member being at the time of his death not a member of a joint undivided family, but separate and apart from the disputants.

In the case before us the property in dispute is the property of one Nageshar. The appellants and respondents both derive their title to the present claim from their descent from one Ganga Bakhsh, the common ancestor alike of Nageshar deceased, of the present appellants, and of the present respondents.

Nageshar was the great-great-grandson of Ganga Bakhsh by Ganga Bakhsh's son Anand. The appellants are great-grandsons of the same Ganga Bakhsh through another son Ahlad.

The respondent Jawahir is also great-grandson of Ganga Bakhsh by a son Bhagwant.

The question we have to decide is whether Jawahir is entitled to exclude all the descendants of Ahlad from inheritance to the property of the deceased Nageshar.

So far as remoteness of relationship from Nageshar is concerned, Jawahir and the appellants stand on a common basis; but Jawahir, who claims preference, rests his claim on the fact that Bhagwant, his grand-father, and Anand, the great-grandfather of Nageshar, were sons of Ganga Bakhsh by one and the same mother. The appellants' grandfather, while also son of Ganga Bakhsh, was his son by another wife. He claims on this ground to have more particles of the common ancestor of himself and Nageshar than the appellants can be deemed to have, and therefore to be so far nearer of kin as to exclude the appellants.

The family is one subject to that School of Hindu Law known as the Mitakshara School, and the guiding principle in that School is by the learned advocate who appears for Jawahir laid down to be, not the amount of spiritual benefit which according to Hindu theology will accrue to the deceased from the funeral oblations offered by the rival claimants, but nearness of blood to the deceased as evinced by the possession of greater or smaller [223] quantity of corporeal particles common to the claimant and the deceased.

To narrow the dispute down to a point. Is the word सपिण्ड as used in the Mitakshara to be interpreted as though the latter half of this Sanskrit compound word related only to particles of common materiality, or to the cake which a Hindu presents at stated intervals to his deceased ancestors?

The portion of the Mitakshara which bears on the question is the chapter which relates to Inheritance and Partition, the दाय विभाग प्रकरणम्, and our particular attention was directed to the passages which are to be found at page 203 of the Yajnavalkya Smriti by the late Babu Shastri Moghe, 3rd Edition, Bombay, 1892. A translation of this passage will be found at pp. 353—358 of the Mitakshara translated by Sir W. H. Macnaghten and H. T. Colebrooke (Calcutta Edition, 1870). This translation is on the whole accurate, (at any rate for the purposes of this appeal its accuracy was not challenged by counsel on either side), with one important exception, namely, the translation attached at p. 356, line 2, to the word सपिण्ड sapinda. With this translation I propose to deal later. The passage runs as follows:—

3. "Besides, the father is a common parent to other sons, but the mother is not so; and, since her propinquity is consequently greatest, it is fit that she should take the estate in the first instance conformably with the text—'To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs.'

4. "Nor is the claim in virtue of propinquity restricted to (sapindas) kinsmen allied by funeral oblations; but on the contrary it appears from this very text (S. 3) that the rule of propinquity is effectual, without any exception, in the case of (samanodacas) kindred connected by libations of water, as well as other relatives, when they appear to have a claim to the succession.

5. "Therefore, since the mother is the nearest of the two parents, it is most fit that she should take the estate. But on failure of her the father is successor to the property."

This passage lays down that the claim to inheritance is guided by propinquity, not only in the case of sapindas but also in that of [224] samanodacas, and that, in the case of brothers, "such as are of the whole blood take the inheritance in the first instance under the text before cited—'To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs'—since those of the half blood are remote through the difference of their mothers." According to the Mitakshara, then, there is no room left for doubt that—

(i) to the nearest sapinda the inheritance belongs,—

(ii) a brother of the full blood is nearer than a brother of the half blood,—

(iii) that this principle of propinquity, whatever it may be, is to be found in, and is to govern the right to, succession in the case of relations so remote as samanodacas.

If propinquity depends, as the learned advocate for Jawahir contends, upon community of particles of the body of an ancestor, there can be no question that Jawahir's right to inherit prevails over that of the appellants and to their exclusion.

As authorities for such being the meaning of the word sapinda we were referred to Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Mankuvarbai (1). See specially page 423, where a passage from the Achara Kanda of the Mitakshara is given, which not only specially enunciates the doctrine that "the person is called a sapinda (who has particles) of the body (of some ancestor, &c.,) in common (with him)" but also adds that "therefore one ought to know that, wherever the word sapinda is used, there exists (between the persons to whom it is applied) a connection with one body either immediately or by descent." From this the learned Chief Justice Sir M.R. Westropp goes on to point out that "this shows that Vijnyanesvara abandoned the doctrine that the right to offer funeral oblations alone constituted sapinda-ship, and adopted, in lieu of it, the theory that sapinda-ship is based upon community of corporeal particles, or in other words, upon consanguinity, and that he maintained that there is such a community between the wives of collaterals." This meaning of the word sapinda and the proposition that the meaning is the same throughout the Mitakshara, [225] whether it occurs in the Achara Kanda or in the Dayavibhag, is fully endorsed and accepted by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Cassibai (2) and they declare themselves "prepared to assent to the conclusion to which the Judges of the High Court, upon consideration of the authorities, arrived, that by the Law of the Mitakshara, as interpreted and accepted in Western India, the preferential right to inherit in the classes of sapindas is to be determined by family relationship or the community of corporeal particles; and not alone by the capacity of performing funeral rites. It may happen that, in some instances, the same person would be the preferential heir, whichever of these lists was adopted."

It is, however, pointed out to us that in Samat v. Amra (3) Sir M. R. Westropp and Mr. Justice Pinhey held that, as there was not any special provision in the Mitakshara or the Mayukha in respect of persons of the half blood other than brothers and their sons, the general rule applies that the nearest sapinda succeeds. But this view must be read in the light of the facts of the case with which they were dealing. That was a case in which the competing candidates were descendants of different and not the same degree.

So far as Western India is concerned the interpretation to be put upon the word sapinda must be considered as finally determined by the ruling of their Lordships above quoted, and it only remains to be seen if there is any reason or authority for holding that the same word is to receive in Northern India any other interpretation. It is clear that this interpretation of the word sapinda divorces it in toto from the meaning assigned to it by Colebrooke in the passage given at page 356 in the translation of the Mitakshara above alluded to. The Calcutta High Court have no doubt in the matter. A Full Bench of that Court in Umaid Bahadur v. Udoi Chand alias Munmun (4), and much more recently a Division Bench in Babu Lal v. Nanku Ram (5) (Norris and Banerji, JJ.) unhesitatingly [226] aver that Colebrooke's translation is inaccurate, and refuse to follow it, accepting in its stead the meaning given to it by Sir M. R. Westropp and their Lordships of the Privy Council in the cases above cited.

In Madras the same view is apparently entertained in Nallanna v. Ponnal (1), Ramappa Udayan v. Arumugath Udayan (2), and in Subramanya Pandya Chokka Talavar v. Siva Subramanya Pillai (3).

The learned vakil for the appellants in a very careful and learned argument, for which we are much indebted to him, laboured hard to get rid of these precedents by falling back upon the Viramitrodaya. Prefacing his remarks by a citation from Girdhari Lall Roy v. The Bengal Government (4) in which the Lords of the Privy Council have formulated the doctrine that the Viramitrodaya is properly receivable as an exposition of what may have been left doubtful by the Mitakshara, he drew our attention to the arguments by which the learned author Mitra Misra first lays down that propinquity by benefit is consistent with reason, and by means of it claims to reconcile all conflicting texts with regard to the order of succession. He adopts what may be, and has been somewhere, termed the common-sense view that the Mitakshara rule would make all the world kin and cannot therefore be accepted. Preference to inherit according to him must and does depend upon the superior efficacy of oblations offered, and not upon any question of the presence in greater or smaller measure of corporeal particles of a common ancestor.

It would be interesting, but in no way profitable, to follow up this discussion, as the matter is really concluded by the view which has been adopted by their Lordships of the Privy Council, a view we cannot depart from, unless something far stronger be brought before us than what is after all only the dictum of a text-book, of great authority undoubtedly, but a dictum against the Mitakshara, [227] and one not supported by any proof of custom or authority in its favor.

There is, moreover, great force in the view taken by the eminent and learned writer Dr. J. Jolly in his Tagore Law Lectures, 1883, p. 168, where he points out that "the right of representation has originated in the patriarchal family system, and it is that system which really lies at the bottom both of the Roman and of the Indian Law of Inheritance. No doubt the Indian rules on inheritance are closely connected with the rules relating to the offering of funeral oblations as well. This is a common characteristic of all early systems of inheritance. But the theory that a spiritual bargain regarding the oblation of the customary offerings to the deceased by the taker of the inheritance is the real basis of the whole Indian Law of Inheritance is a mistake which has arisen in the early period of the administration of Hindu Law from a too exclusive study of the writers of the Bengal School and from certain terms often recurring in Colebrooke's translation of Indian law books, notably from the term 'connected by funeral oblations,' the English equivalent chosen by Colebrooke for the well-known Sanskrit term sapinda. This theory has now been given up so far that a difference of doctrine in this respect between the Bengal writers and those of other Schools has been recognized." This view coincides with my experience, so far as it goes, of the course and current of Hindu Law, especially on the law of inheritance. In patriarchal times when all was one common family there would be practically no distinction between the right to inherit of whole and half blood relations. Manu has no such subtle distinction. It is not until priestly interference predominates that the natural rule is trammelled and confused by questions of religious efficacy.

I see no reason to put upon the Mitakshara any construction other than what has been put upon it by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gridhari Lall Roy v. The Bengal Government (1), and, read in this light, we must hold that the distinction [228] between the whole blood and the half blood observed in the case of brothers and their sons extends to the descendants of the grand-father, it may be, to the fourteenth degree, certainly to the case referred to us. With remoter ascendants the case before us is in no way concerned, and we, therefore, decline to give any answer upon this part of the question.

BANERJI, J.—I also would answer in the affirmative that portion of the question referred to us which directly bears on the present case.

The facts are so fully set forth in the order of reference that it is unnecessary to recapitulate them except briefly. Nageshwar, whose property is the subject matter of the suit, was a separated Hindu governed by the Mitakshara law. The inheritance to his estate is claimed on the one hand by Jawahir, who is the grandson of Bhagwant, the uterine brother of Nageshwar's great grandfather Anand; it is claimed on the other hand by the plaintiffs, the grandsons of Anand's half brother Ahlad; and it is contended on behalf of Jawahir that he has a preferential right over the plaintiffs by reason of his being the descendant of a brother of the whole blood of Anand. This contention raises the question referred to us, namely, whether the preference of the whole blood is limited to the case of brothers and their sons or extends to remoter agnates.

The question is not covered by the authority of any decided case so far as these Provinces are concerned, and has, therefore, to be answered with reference to the texts of Hindu Law. It is conceded that the Mitakshara recognizes the distinction of whole blood and half blood in the case of brothers and their sons and gives the preference to the former over the latter. But it is urged that there is no authority in the Mitakshara for carrying this distinction further. That the enumeration of heirs as given in the Mitakshara is not exhaustive, but illustrative only, is no longer open to question. As regards some heirs the Mitakshara mentions them by name. As regards others it lays down rules for determining who they are. We have, therefore, to consider what those rules are and [229] what is the guiding principle which underlies them. That principle is founded on the text of Manu:—"To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs." (Chapter IX, v. 187.) The whole question thus turns on the meaning attributed by the author of the Mitakshara to the term sapinda, and on the test which he prescribes for determining the degree of nearness among sapindas.

It has been held in the cases to which my brother Knox has referred that Colebrooke's rendering of the word sapinda as "kinsmen by funeral oblations" is incorrect and that Vijnanesvara meant by it persons connected by particles of the same body. Whatever may have been the signification attached to the word sapinda by the early sages, there cannot be any doubt that Vijnanesvara used it in the sense mentioned above. In the Achar Kanda of the Mitakshara he defines the term sapinda, and states that the "sapinda relationship arises between two people through their being connected by particles of one body." And he adds that "one ought to know that wherever the word sapinda is used there exists (between the persons to whom it is applied) a connection with one body either immediately or by descent." (West and Buhler's Digest of Hindu Law, pp. 120 and 121.) He then combats the theory that the sapinda relationship is founded upon the connection arising from the presentation of exequial cakes and declares that "the father and the other descendants are six sapindas; and the son and the other descendants are six; and the man himself is the seventh." (Sarbadikari's Tagore Law Lectures, pp. 603 and 604.) No definition of the word sapinda is, it is true, given in the chapter of the Mitakshara relating to inheritance, but, as pointed out in Lallubhai Bapubhai v. Mankuvarbai (1), there is no reason to assume that the same word was used in different senses in the same work by the same author. I may observe that in the very able argument which was addressed to us in this case it was not disputed that Vijñanesvara used the word sapinda as denoting persons descended from a common ancestor.

[230] The next question we have to consider is—what is the test of determining nearness among sapindas as conferring priority of right to inherit? Is it affinity, that is, the possession of the largest number of corporeal particles, or the ability to confer the highest amount of spiritual benefit by the presentation of funeral oblations? The latter is no doubt the test according to the Dayabhaga School, but the Mitakshara has nowhere adopted it. The rule of propinquity is the guiding principle according to the Mitakshara School. In determining the order of succession among the two parents the Mitakshara says:—

"Besides, the father is a common parent to other sons, but the mother is not so, and, since her propinquity is consequently greatest, it is fit that she should take the estate in the first instance conformably with the text—'To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs,' (Chapter II, section iii, v. 3).

"Nor is the claim in virtue of propinquity restricted to sapindas, but on the contrary it appears from this very text that the rule of propinquity is effectual, without any exception, in the case of samanodacas, as well as other relatives, when they appear to have a claim to the succession, (v. 4).

"Therefore, since the mother is nearest of the two parents, it is most fit that she should take the estate. But, on failure of her, the father is successor to the property, (v. 5)."

Again, dealing with brothers of the whole blood and the half blood, the author says, in section iv, v. 5:—

"Among brothers, such as are of the whole blood take the inheritance in the first instance under the text before cited—'To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs'—since those of the half blood are remote through the difference of the mothers."

The passages quoted above leave no room for doubt that propinquity determines the order of succession, and that the rule of propinquity applies not only to sapindas but to samanodacas and all other relatives also. This rule was adopted by Visvesvara Bhatta, the author of the Madana Parijata [231] and the Subodhini, and by Balam Bhutta, two of the commentators on the Mitakshara regarded as "great authorities" in the Benares School (Sarbadhikari's Tagore Law Lectures, pp. 411, 439 and 484).

The learned vakil for the appellants, whilst conceding that the right to inherit is founded on propinquity, contended that the test of preference was the competency to confer spiritual benefit, and in support of that contention he referred to several passages in the Viramitrodaya, which is recognised as an undoubted authority in the Benares School. No doubt there are passages in that work which favour the appellants' contention, notably one at p. 158 of Golap Chandra Sarkar's Translation where the author says:—"Hence it is indicated that he alone is entitled to get the estate on whom the estate being devolved conduces to the greatest amount of spiritual benefit of the deceased owner, and that proximity in this way is to be accepted as a general rule and reasonable." But there are other passages where the author lays down the rule that "where the question concerning the order (of succession) arises, there propinquity determines the order" (p. 186), and that "greatness of propinquity is alone the criterion of succession" (p. 194). Upon a careful consideration of the Viramitrodaya it appears that the rule of propinquity is, according to Mitra Misra, the rule of preferable succession, and that the capacity to confer spiritual benefit is, as Dr. Jolly, remarks, (Tagore Law Lectures, 1883, p. 209), referred to as an additional reason for the right to succeed. According to the ruling of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Girdhari Lall Roy v. The Bengal Government (1), the Viramitrodaya is "receivable as an exposition of what may have been left doubtful by the Mitakshara," but, where the Mitakshara itself is clear and its meaning and intention are not open to doubt, the Viramitrodaya cannot be accepted in preference to the Mitakshara. As I have shown above, the Mitakshara enjoins in very distinct terms, in chapter II, section iii, v. 4, that for the purpose of determining the order of succession among [232] relatives of all descriptions, including samanodacas, the rule of propinquity is to be applied "without any exception." It may be that where two sapindas stand, with reference to propinquity, in the same degree of nearness to the propositus, the capacity to confer the highest amount of spiritual benefit should be applied as a test to determine the order of priority. But, where the degrees of propinquity are different, the rule of religious efficacy has according to the Mitakshara no application. There can be no doubt that, among sapindas of the same degree of descent from a common ancestor, those who are descended from the same mother as the propositus are nearer in propinquity than those descended from a different mother. Such sapindas, therefore, have the preferable right to inherit according to the text of Manu—"To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs." The Mitakshara, it is true, gives the preference to a sapinda, who offers funeral cakes, over a samanodaca, who offers libations of water only; but, as Mr. Mayne points out, (Hindu Law and Usage, s. 468, 5th Edition, p. 581) "the distinction is stated, not as evidencing different degrees of religious merit, but as marking different degrees of propinquity." I may also observe that in the case of samanodacas it is not possible to apply the test of religious efficacy.

For the above reasons, I am of opinion that the distinction of whole blood and half blood applies, according to the rule of succession of the Mitakshara, founded on nearness of propinquity, to sapinda relations other than the brother and his sons. As supporting a contrary view the learned vakil for the appellant relied on the case of Samat v Amra (2) which is the only reported case which has some bearing on the present question. The learned Judges who decided that case expressed the opinion that "neither the Mitakshara nor the Mayukha takes any distinction between persons of the whole blood and persons of the half blood, except in the cases of brothers and sons of brothers." With great [233] deference it seems to me that the learned Judges have overlooked the fact that the enumeration of heirs given in the Mitakshara is not exhaustive, a fact now definitely settled by their Lordships of the Privy Council, and of the rule of the Mitakshara, propounded in v. 4, s. iii of the second chapter, that the succession of all relations, "without any exception," is regulated by the rule of nearness of propinquity, that is, the possession of the largest number of particles of one body. The distinction was extended by Visvesvar Bhatta to the case of paternal uncles. In his Madana Parijata he states that "among paternal uncles the succession of uterine and half blood uncles should be regulated in the same manner as in the case of brothers" (Sarbadhikari's Tagore Law Lectures, p. 440). So that the limitation which the learned Judges impose on the distinction between whole blood and half blood relations on what they consider to be the authority of the Mitakshara was not recognized by one of the commentators on the Mitakshara itself whose eminence as an authority in the Benares School is generally recognized. Srikrishna Tarkalankar extended the distinction, in the Bengal School, to the grandson of a brother. I am, therefore, unable to hold that the distinction does not extend beyond brothers and their sons, and I agree in the answer which my learned brother Knox would give to the reference.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur in the answer which my learned brothers Knox and Banerji propose to give to the reference. The dispute, in the case out of which this reference has arisen, was as regards the succession to the property of one Nageshwar, a separated Hindu, who died without issue and without leaving any near relations. Nageshwar's great-grandfather had a full-brother named Bhagwant and a half-brother named Ahlad. The dispute in this case is between the grandsons of the half-brother Ahlad and the grandson of the full-brother Bhagwant. In paragraph 529 of his work on Hindu Law Mayne says that priority on the ground of full blood is limited to the cases of brothers and their issue. Similarly West and Bühler at page 125 of their work on Hindu [234] Law say :—"The distinction between the whole blood and the half blood observed in the case of brothers and their sons does not extend to the descendants of the grandfather and remote ancestors." If this proposition is correct, the answer to the reference should be in the negative. But the only authority which these authors give for the proposition they lay down is a case decided by the Bombay High Court, Samat v. Amra (1). It is true that the learned Judges who decided that case observed that the Mitakshara does not make any distinction between persons of the whole blood and persons of the half blood except in the case of brothers and sons of brothers, and further on they say that there is no special provision in the Mitakshara in respect of persons of the half blood other than brothers and their sons. If they mean by this that the Mitakshara has not specially referred to cases of the half blood other than those of brothers and their sons, the learned Judges are right, but, if the meaning was that the author of the Mitakshara restricted the distinction between the whole and the half blood to the case of brothers and their issue, I cannot concur with them. The cases given in paragraphs 5, 6 and 7 of s. 4 of chapter II of the Mitakshara are merely illustrative and not exhaustive. The reason which the author of the Mitakshara gives for the preference of brothers of the whole blood to brothers of the half blood is the text of Manu, who says:—"To the nearest sapinda the inheritance next belongs." Had the learned Judges who decided the Bombay case considered the effect of paragraph 4 in the preceding section of the Mitakshara, they would have seen that it was never the intention of the author to restrict the application of this rule to brothers and their sons, for in that paragraph the author distinctly says that the rule of propinquity extends without any exception to the case of relatives even so distant as samanodacas. This case is governed by the law of the Mitakshara, and, as that is in my opinion quite clear on the point referred, I concur in the proposed answer to the reference.

RANI KANNO DAI (Judgment-debtor) v. B. J. LACY (Decree-holder).^{*}
[9th January, 1897.]

Execution of decree—Decree for money—Application for receiver of rents of immoveable property of a deceased Hindu in the hands of his widow—Hindu law—Hindu widow.

Held, that a Court executing a simple money decree obtained against a sonless separated Hindu was not competent to appoint a receiver of the rents, accruing since his decease, of the judgment-debtor's immoveable property, then in the hands of his widow as her widow's estate, such rents not being assets of the deceased, but the personal moveable property of the widow, and this even if the decree-holder had not, as in fact he had, agreed for consideration not to execute his decree against the moveable property of the widow.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

Mr. D. N. Banerji and Babu Satish Chandra Banerji, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—This is an appeal from an order passed by the Subordinate Judge of Agra in execution of a decree for money. The applicant for execution describes himself as Mr. B. J. Lacy, son of Dr. J. C. Lacy, Englishman, occupation service, resident of Agra Cantonments, decree-holder. It is rather difficult from the record to ascertain who the real parties are. One of the papers is headed—"Dr. J. Lacy, decree-holder." Another paper is signed—"A. Lacy, attorney of the Revd. B. Lacy;" and Mr. A. Lacy describes himself as the decree-holder's brother. These proceedings in execution recall to the mind of any Judge who has [236] sat in this Court in recent years the sad story of the ruin of Bishambar Nath of Agra. However, in this case, we have got to see what are the rights in law to which the Revd. B. Lacy is entitled; and we have also got to see that he gets nothing further than the law entitles him to. He applied for attachment, and he followed that up immediately by an application for the appointment of a receiver of the rents and profits of the property which he proposed to sell in execution of a decree for money. He apparently conceived that a judgment-creditor executing his decree for money was entitled to be placed in the position, at the expense of the judgment-debtor, of a mortgagee in possession. The application was made against the widow of Bishambar Nath. Bishambar Nath was a sonless separated Hindu, and the lady was, as his widow, entitled to a widow's estate in her husband's property; of course, subject to such rights as the law gave to other persons against the property of her late husband. On the 18th of July, 1895, a compromise was effected between Bishambar Nath's widow and the execution creditor. She produced as a consideration for the compromise, and delivered to the creditor, a promissory note or hundi of the value of Rs. 8,000, and on his side he undertook not to execute the decree against the moveable property of the widow or any immoveable property that might be acquired by her, but he was left at liberty to execute his decree against the immoveable property which had been of Bishambar Nath in his lifetime. In violation of that agreement, and indeed, it appears to us, in contravention of law, the Revd. B. Lacy now seeks to execute his decree by a species of sequestration of the lady's personal estate. There can be no doubt, as we conceive the law to be in this country, that this lady, as the widow of a separated and sonless Hindu, became, in virtue of her widow's estate, entitled upon the death of her husband to the rents which might accrue from the immoveable property. Those rents, if already received by her and put into her pocket, could not be treated in law as assets of her husband. They were her assets in virtue of her widow's estate. It can make no difference if the rents which accrued due after her husband's death [237] had not been actually put into her pocket. She was entitled to them, not as representative of her late husband, but in right of her widow's estate; and what the Revd. B. Lacy now seeks to do is, having obtained the advantage of the compromise, and having obtained the hundi for Rs. 8,000, to seize, in violation of that agreement, this lady's own personal estate and to deprive her of all means of subsistence, and possibly put it out of her power to contest any such proceeding on his part. The lady objected; and the Revd. B. Lacy, through his attorney, A. Lacy, set up a case, in his reply of the 10th of July 1896, that he ought not to be bound in equity or in law by the compromise. What may be the views as to equity and good conscience of the Revd. B. Lacy, or his attorney A. Lacy, may be inferred from the facts which we have stated and from the reply which the Revd. B. Lacy, through his attorney, filed in this matter on the 10th of July 1896. The Revd. B. Lacy alleges, through his attorney A. Lacy, that A. Lacy, who appears to be his brother, was compelled by undue influence and pressure exercised upon him to give his consent to the compromise in respect of the Rs. 8,000. It apparently did not strike the Revd. B. Lacy, or his attorney A. Lacy, that equity and good conscience would expect of him, if he sought to avoid the compromise, to make restitution of the Rs. 8,000, or such portion of it as had got into his pocket. This is only another sad phase of this sad story. The Subordinate Judge made an order, the effect of which was that the Revd. B. Lacy might sequester the private and personal income of this lady derived from the estate in right of her title as a Hindu widow. In making that order the Subordinate Judge was wrong, and we set aside the order in that respect and allow the objection in that respect. The Revd. B. Lacy is entitled to execute his decree by obtaining a sale of the immovable property left by Bishambar Nath, or so much of it as will satisfy his decree and the costs of sale. Let us hope that, when the property is about to be put up for sale, permission to the decree-holder or any one on his behalf to bid may not be given.

We allow this appeal with costs.

DEBI BAKHSH SINGH AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. TIRBHAWAN
SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs)* [11th January, 1897.]

Regulation No. XI of 1825, s. 4—Alluvion—Title to land acquired by gradual accretion—Limitation.

Clause 1 of s. 4 of Regulation XI of 1825 does not depend for its operation on the capability of identification of the accreted lands. Whether the accreted lands are capable of identification or not, the clause applies where the lands have been gained by gradual accession by the recession of a river.

In the case of gradual accretions the ordinary rule of acquisition by prescription does not apply, but each accretion as it occurs comes under the same title as that upon the land to which it is made is held.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—This case really turns upon the construction of cl. 1 of s. 4 of Regulation XI of 1825. It appears that the Rapti flowed at one time between the land of the plaintiffs and the land of the defendants; that over a series of years it gradually encroached upon the land of the plaintiffs and threw up correspondingly land which became alluvion and adjoined the defendants' land, and that this went on gradually contracting the area of the plaintiffs' land, which was submerged and subsequently re-appeared adjoining the lands of the defendants. The parties during that course of years seem to have had no doubt of the application, as we read it, of cl. 1 of s. 4 of Regulation XI of 1825, for, as the land appeared on the defendants' side of the river, they obtained possession of it, cultivated it and treated it as their land. That in our opinion they were entitled to do by reason of cl. 1 of s. 4. That land became by gradual accession from the recession of the river Rapti an increment to the tenure of the defendants. So matters continued until 1893, when the Rapti suddenly altered its course, and cut off from the defendants' side the lands which had gradually accreted in the manner [239] we have described and left them on the plaintiffs' side of the river. The plaintiffs brought their suit for possession, not only of the land which had accreted in the manner described to the defendants, and of which they had obtained possession more than twelve years before suit and had hitherto maintained possession, but also of the land which had accreted to the defendants, and of which they had obtained possession within twelve years of the suit. In our opinion limitation in this case has nothing to do with the question, except in so far as it would strengthen the title to those portions of the lands of which the defendants have had possession for more than twelve years before suit. In our view of the case the title to all the land which accreted in the way we have described vested on the gradual accretion in the defendants upon the same title as that upon which they held their original lands. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the suit. The District Judge on appeal by the plaintiffs confirmed the decree of the Subordinate Judge, dismissing the suit so far as it related to accreted lands of which the defendants had been in possession for twelve years and gave the plaintiffs a decree for the whole of the accreted lands of which the defendants had not had twelve years possession before suit. His view of the law was that, when lands were capable of being identified, although they might gradually have accreted, cl. 1 of s. 4 of the Regulation did not apply. That view was apparently based upon a misconception of the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Felix Lopez v. Muddan Thakoor (1). The Judge failed to notice that in the case which was before their Lordships of the Privy Council there had been no gradual accretion at all. The village of Lopez the plaintiff was entirely submerged, remained under water for a considerable period, and on its re-appearance was promptly seized upon by the defendants. It comes to this, that, if the view of the District Judge were correct, and the correctness of that view has been vigorously upheld by Mr. Ram Prasad in this Court on behalf of the respondents, cl. 1 of s. 4 of Regulation XI of 1825 could only apply to [240] infinitesimal accretions caused by the recession of a river. So long as lands were capable of identification by lines drawn from one place which had not been submerged to another, cl. 1 could never apply according to that view; and indeed, on that view of the construction of cl. 1 of s. 4, it is difficult to understand what would have been the necessity of enacting cl. 2. We must put a natural construction upon cl. 1, and we hold that, whether the accreted lands are capable of identification or not, the clause applies where the lands have been gained by gradual accession by the recession of the river. It does seem rather hard in this case that lands undoubtedly belonging to these plaintiffs should, by the perverse course which the river Rapti chose to take, become vested in the defendants, but we have to apply the law as we find it. It was unfortunate for the plaintiffs that the river was not as accommodating to them as to the defendants, but suddenly altered its course. We set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, and restore the decree of the first Court with costs in all Courts, and dismiss the respondents' objections with costs.

* Second Appeal, No. 978 of 1894, from a decree of V. A. Smith, Esq., District Judge of Gorakhpur, dated the 29th May 1894, modifying a decree of Syed Siraj-ud-din, Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur, dated 29th May 1893.

Appeal decreed.

THE plaintiffs in this case sued to recover possession of certain zamindari property and some houses, which latter they valued for the purposes of this suit at Rs. 1,400. One of the defendants to the suit in his written statement objected that the houses in [241] question were undervalued, and that in consequence the plaint was not sufficiently stamped and ought to be rejected. The Subordinate Judge thereupon himself inspected the houses, and having recorded his opinion that the proper value was Rs. 2,100, ordered the deficiency in the Court fee to be made good within four days from the date of the order, which was made on the 23rd of November 1894. On the 28th of November the plaintiffs came into Court and asked for an extension of the period fixed for payment of the additional Court fee by one day, on the ground that, the treasury having closed, they could not obtain the requisite stamps on that day. The Subordinate Judge, apparently being of opinion that the time limited had not expired, granted the plaintiffs the time they asked for, and on the following day the deficiency was made good.

When the suit came on for hearing, the objection as to deficiency of Court fee was again raised by the defendants, and it was contended that the payment made under the order last mentioned was made too late. The Subordinate Judge accepted this contention, stating that he had been misled as to the time when the period limited for making good the deficiency in the court-fee expired. The Subordinate Judge held that the plaint should be rejected under s. 54 (b) of the Code of Civil Procedure, and passed orders accordingly.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—This is an appeal from an order rejecting a plaint purporting to have been passed under s. 54, cl. (b) of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff sued for possession of certain lands and houses. One of the defendants in the written statement filed by him set out that the relief sought had been undervalued. In course of time the Court proceeded to determine the question thus raised by inspection of the house property in dispute. It came to the conclusion that the property [242] had been undervalued, and fixed what it deemed a correct value, and directed that the plaintiff should within four days supply the deficient Court fee stamps. This order was passed on the 23rd of November 1894. On the 26th of November, that is, before the four days granted had expired, the plaintiff brought a portion of the deficient Court fees into Court, and asked permission to withdraw his claim to a portion of the house property with leave to sue again for the portion thus omitted. The Court very properly refused to grant the petition under s. 373 of the Code until the Court fee duty still deficient had been paid in. The order just recited was passed on the 28th of November. The plaintiff then said that the treasury was closed and he could not put in a Court fee stamp, but he tendered a sum of money equivalent to the deficiency of the Court fees. The Court, being under the erroneous impression, as it says in its order, that the four days granted under the order of the 23rd had not expired, allowed the plaintiff one day more within which to make good the deficiency, and on the 29th the deficiency was paid in Court fees stamps within the period thus enlarged. The defendant objected to the receipt of the deficient Court fees on the 29th on the ground that the time granted had already expired. The Court on the 4th of December allowed the contention raised by the defendant to prevail, and, thinking the case fell within s. 54, cl. (b), and that it had no option but to reject the plaint, so rejected it.

Neither cl. (a) nor (b) of s. 54 of the Code had any reference to the case before the Court. The plaintiff had not been required by the Court to correct the valuation, and had not refused to make any correction: cl. (a) therefore does not apply. The relief sought had not been properly valued, so cl. (b) could have no application. The order rejecting the plaint, therefore, was in any case wrong.

The law under which the Court could have acted and ought to have acted was cl. ii of s. 10 of Act No. VII of 1870. That section provides that, when a Court finds after investigation that the value placed on property in dispute has been insufficient, it shall require the plaintiff to pay so much additional fees as would [243] have been payable on a correct valuation, and cl. ii provides that the suit shall be stayed till the additional fees be paid. If the additional fees be not paid within such time as the Court shall fix, the suit shall be dismissed. The order which the Court, therefore, should have passed was not an order rejecting the plaint, but an order dismissing the suit.

The contention which the defendant raised was precisely similar to that which was raised in reference to an extension of time which had been asked for, but was refused by the High Court of Calcutta, on an application under s. 549 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The words in that section setting forth the consequences of not furnishing security within a fixed time are almost identical with the words used in s. 10, cl. ii, of Act No. VII of 1870. The case in question is Budri Narain v. Mussammatt Sheo Koer (1). The Privy Council held that an application to enlarge the time for giving security may be made either before or after the expiration of the time within which the security has been ordered to be furnished, and that the Court may thereupon enlarge the time according to any necessity which may arise when it is just and proper that such an extension should be given; but, if ultimately the order is not complied with and the security not furnished, the appeal may be dismissed.

The words used in s. 10, cl. ii, of Act No. VII of 1870, that the "suit shall be dismissed," are no stronger and not more imperative than the words "the Court shall reject the appeal" in section 549 of the Code. We have no doubt that the interpretation put by their Lordships on the words in s. 549 of the Code of Civil Procedure should be applied to the words in s. 10 of Act VII of 1870. We note that in the case of Bhugwandas Bagla v. Haji Abu Ahmad (1) the construction put by their Lordships on s. 549 was held to be applicable to the words "the plaint shall be rejected" in s. 54 of the Code. We hold that the order passed on the 28th of November in this case, granting the extension of one day, [244] was a valid order and under the circumstances a reasonable order.

We, therefore, decree the appeal, and set aside the order of the Court below with costs, and we direct the record to be returned to the lower Court which will dispose of the case according to law.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, art. 61—Limitation—Suit for money payable to the plaintiff for money paid for the defendant.

Under an award two persons were made liable each for the payment of a moiety of the expenses of certain temples which were held jointly. One of the persons so made liable, alleging that he had paid more than his share of the expenses, sued the other for the balance in excess of the moiety which he was bound to pay under the award. Held that the suit was governed by art. 61 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and that, although the taking of accounts might be necessary, the suit was not a suit for an account to which art. 120 of the same schedule might apply. *Rohm v. JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The parties to this appeal and the defendants Nos. 2 and 3 in the Court below are joint owners of certain temples in Muttra and Gokal. Disputes having arisen between them in regard to the temple property, those disputes were referred to arbitration, and on the 15th of March 1888, an award was made by the arbitrators which defined the rights of the parties. [245] With the exception of three temples, which remained the joint property of the parties, all other property was divided. As regards those temples the award provided that the expenses connected with them and the income arising from them should be borne and received in equal moieties; the defendant No. 1, appellant here, being liable for and entitled to one moiety. The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought by the respondent on the 27th of April 1893, on the allegation that a sum of Rs. 4,000 was due to him by the defendant No. 1 on account of a debt which the said defendant was liable to discharge under the award. The plaintiff further alleged that he had advanced on account of the expenses of the temples Rs. 24,100-1-9; that the first defendant had paid Rs. 4,232-11-3 only: that a moiety of those amounts was payable by the said defendant; that the plaintiff had thus paid more than the half which under the award he was bound to pay: and that he was entitled to obtain a sum of Rs. 9,933-11-3 on that account from the defendant. He further alleged that, according to the practice of the temples, in addition to the expenses of the temples, the kitchen expenses of the parties (Tapeli) and the expenses of keeping pigeons were payable as expenses connected with the temples. He prayed for a decree for the recovery of the amounts mentioned above, which, together with interest, amounted to Rs. 20,641-2-6, after an adjustment of the accounts of the temples, and he also prayed for a declaration that the kitchen and pigeon expenses were a part of the temple expenses, and should be defrayed equally by the parties. As for the item of Rs. 4,000 mentioned above, the claim has been dismissed, and we have not to consider the propriety of the decree as regards that item. As for the other items, the defendant No. 1, appellant here, contended that a great portion of the claim was barred by limitation, and that the amount which the plaintiff alleged he had paid on account of temple expenses included large sums which represented the personal expenses of the plaintiff and were not debitable to the temple funds. The amount of those expenses was stated by the defendant to be Rs. 15,387-8. The Court below allowed the defendant's pleas as regards four of the [246] items objected to by the defendant, amounting to Rs. 5,819-13-3. It overruled the plea of limitation and made a decree in favour of the plaintiff for Rs. 7,023-12-6. As regards the second prayer contained in the plaint it held that the personal kitchen expenses of the parties were not to form a part of the temple expenses, and it made a decree, with reference to that prayer, to the effect that the pigeon expenses and temple bhog expenses should be paid, and food for servants, devotees and visitors should be supplied by the temples. The defendant who has preferred this appeal contends, in the first place, that the Court below has erred in holding that no portion of the claim is barred by limitation. The Subordinate Judge seems to have been of opinion that the suit was one for compensation for breach of a contract, the contract being the award made on the 15th March 1888. Although the Subordinate Judge does not refer to article 116 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877, he evidently was of opinion that that article applied, and that, if that article did not apply, no other article in the schedule was clearly applicable, and consequently the suit was governed by article 120, which provides the same period of limitation as article 116, namely, six years. It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the suit was one for money payable to the plaintiff for money paid for the defendant and was governed by article 61 of the schedule. On the other hand, the learned counsel for the respondent argued that the suit was one for an account, and, there being no article in the schedule which specially governed a suit for an account of this nature, article 120 was applicable. We are of opinion that this suit cannot be regarded as a suit for an account. It is true that in the plaint the plaintiff prays for a decree for money on settlement of accounts, and further adds that, if on an adjustment of accounts, a larger amount than that mentioned in the plaint be found payable to the plaintiff, a decree be passed in his favour for such larger sum. The mere fact, however, of the plaintiff asking for a settlement of accounts would not make the suit a suit for an account, unless the main object of the suit was to obtain an account. A suit for an account implies an obligation on [247] the part of the defendant to account to the plaintiff for moneys received or spent on the plaintiff's behalf. Upon the allegation made by the plaintiff no such obligation attached to the defendant in this case, nor was it the main object of the plaintiff to have an account adjusted. The gist of the claim appears from the eighth paragraph of the plaint. What the plaintiff stated in that paragraph was that both he and the defendant No. 1 were liable in equal moieties for all the temple expenses, and that he had paid a sum far in excess of the moiety for which he was liable, and he sued to recover from the defendant the money which the plaintiff said he had paid in lieu of the defendant for what was payable by the defendant. It is true that for the purpose of granting the relief sought by the plaintiff it would be necessary to examine accounts, but that would not in our opinion render the suit one for an account. We think that the suit was one contemplated by article 61 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877, and was a suit for which three years' limitation is provided in that article. Our view on this point is supported by the principle of the ruling of the Full Bench in Rohan v. Jwala Prasad (1). The learned counsel for the respondent has not attempted to support the opinion of the Subordinate Judge that article 116 would apply to this suit. We think that that article has no application to this case.

[The rest of the judgment, being occupied with a discussion of the facts of the case, is not reported—ED.]

[3rd January, 1897.]

Execution of decree—Surety after passing of decree—Mode of realization of security—Civil Procedure Code, s. 253—Jurisdiction.

Where after the passing of a decree for arrears of rent a friend of the judgment-debtor entered into a security bond whereby he rendered himself personally liable and hypothecated a share in certain zamindari property to [248] secure the due performance of the decree, it was held that the obligation created by such security bond could not be enforced by a Court of Revenue by the sale of the hypothecated property.

^{*} Second Appeal, No. 1056 of 1894, from a decree of Kunwar Jwala Prasad, Officiating District Judge of Azamgarh, dated the 14th June 1894, reversing a decree of Baboo Sanwal Singh, Subordinate Judge of Azamgarh, dated the 13th October 1893.

(1) 16 A. 333.

THIS appeal arose out of a suit for cancelment of a sale held by a Court of Revenue under the following circumstances:—

One Behari Lal Sabu obtained a decree for arrears of rent against Datta Singh and Ganga Singh. After that decree had been obtained, Jagbandan Singh and Balgobind Misr executed a security bond whereby they undertook jointly and severally to satisfy the decree of Behari Lal, and also hypothecated certain zamindari property as security. The decretal amount not having been paid, the decree-holder applied to a Court of Revenue in execution of his decree for the sale of the property hypothecated under the above-mentioned security bond; which property, after certain objections having been made by the sureties and disallowed by the Court, was sold. The surety Jagbandan Singh thereupon brought a suit to have the sale set aside.

The Court of first instance dismissed the suit, holding that by reason of s. 312 of the Code of Civil Procedure such a suit did not lie.

The plaintiff appealed, and the lower appellate Court decreed the appeal and set aside the sale. The defendant-judgment-creditor appealed to the High Court.

Gobind Prasad and Kalindi Prasad, for the appellant.

Baldeo Ram, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—The Court of Revenue had no jurisdiction to sell the plaintiff's property. It is true he was a surety; but he was not a surety to whom s. 253 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied, as he became a surety after the passing of the decree. The Court of Revenue in our opinion was without jurisdiction. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 526, 192—Transfer of criminal case by the High Court to the Court of a District Magistrate—Interpretation of order—Practice.

When a criminal case is transferred by an order of the High Court from a Court subordinate to a District Magistrate to the Court of a District Magistrate, if it is intended that the District Magistrate shall have power to transfer the case to a subordinate Court, that intention will be expressed in the order of the High Court. On application to the High Court these cases were, by order of Blair, J., transferred to the Court of the District Magistrate of Allahabad. That order of transfer was worded in a general manner, and contained no direction that the District Magistrate should himself try the cases so transferred. The District Magistrate of Allahabad being unable, owing to press of work, to try the said cases himself, made them over, under the provisions of s. 192 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to the Joint Magistrate. There being some doubt under the circumstances whether it was intended that the District Magistrate of Allahabad should try the cases transferred to him himself, or whether he had power to act under s. 192 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, an application was made by the Public Prosecutor for an order transferring the said cases specifically to the Court of the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad. This application being laid before a Bench the following orders were passed thereon :—

[250] The Public Prosecutor (Mr. E. Chamier) in support of the application.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—This is an application for the transfer of certain cases pending in the Court of the District Magistrate of Allahabad to a Court subordinate to him. The cases in question were transferred by the order of this Court from an Assistant Magistrate subordinate to the District Magistrate of Mirzapur to the Court of the District Magistrate of Allahabad without any further direction being given in the order. Personally, I have always understood that, when the High Court made an order of transfer in a criminal case to the Court of a District Magistrate, it gives by that order full power to the Court of the District Magistrate to which the transfer was made to exercise the same jurisdiction precisely as the Magistrate of that Court could have exercised if the case had been instituted in his Court unless the contrary was expressed in the order of this Court. Cases may arise in which it is desirable that the case should be tried by the Magistrate of the District and not by a subordinate. In those cases, of course, if the High Court directs that the case is to be tried in the Court of the District Magistrate, the District Magistrate must try the case and cannot transfer it. Those cases are of rare occurrence, and it appears to me that it is highly undesirable to limit the discretion of the District Magistrate in the distribution of the work in his district, whether originally instituted in his district or transferred to his Court. The District Magistrate must know better than the High Court can what Magistrates of competent jurisdiction are most available for inquiry into any particular case. Speaking personally, I should have had no doubt that the District Magistrate of Allahabad was competent to make the order of transfer which he made in this case. When he took seizin of the case, it appears to me that the same power and jurisdiction devolved on him which he should have had if the case had been originally instituted in his Court and he had taken cognizance of it. Part of that power would have been to order the transfer of the case to any competent Court subordinate to his Court. It has been my practice, since I sat in this Court first, to include in my [251] order words expressing that the District Magistrate, unless I otherwise intended, has power to transfer the case transferred to his Court to any Court subordinate to him that was competent. If I happened not to put those words in, I did not intend to limit what I conceive to be the powers of the District Magistrate to whose Court I transferred the case. But, when I made an order intending that on the transfer the case should be tried in a particular Court and not transferred, I have specially expressed in my order that the case should be tried by the particular Court to which I was transferring it. However, as there may be a difference of opinion on the question as to the meaning of an order drawn up as this order was in a case in which the transfer is from a Court subordinate to a District Magistrate to a District Magistrate's Court, the practice which we are prepared to follow in future will be that in such cases, if we intend that the District Magistrate should have power to transfer the case to a subordinate Court, that intention will be expressed in our order. If no such intention is expressed, it will be understood that, in the case of a transfer from a Court subordinate to a District Magistrate to a District Magistrate's Court, that District Magistrate's Court is expected to try the case itself; but, when the transfer is from the Court of one District Magistrate to the Court of another District Magistrate, it will be understood that, unless the contrary is directly expressed, the Magistrate of the Court to which the transfer is made has power and jurisdiction to apply s. 192 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and to transfer the case to the Court of any Magistrate subordinate to him who may be competent to try it.

In the present case, as there has been a misunderstanding of the nature of the order, and to avoid any question in future as to the jurisdiction, we order notice to go to the respondents to show cause why the cases against them should not be transferred from the Court of the District Magistrate to the Court of Mr. Dupernex, the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad, and to his successor in that Court in case Mr. Dupernex ceases to be Joint Magistrate of Allahabad.

[252] BLAIR, J.—I assent to the order that notice go. The order for transfer was couched by me in the most general terms under the impression, which I still entertain, that an order so expressed transferred the case to the full and unlimited jurisdiction of the District Magistrate to whose Court it was transferred. Nothing was placed before me at the hearing of the case which would have led me to make a transfer of a more special and limited kind. But I think it of the highest importance that the practice of the Court in these matters should be uniform. I think the suggestion of the Chief Justice as to the course to be followed in future will save doubt and difficulty hereafter. I assent to the order proposed.

BURKITT, J.—I am of opinion that this application is quite unnecessary, but nevertheless I do not dissent from the order proposed, and to secure uniformity of practice in the Court I am willing in future to adopt the procedure suggested by the learned Chief Justice, though I confess I am unable to appreciate fully the distinction sought to be drawn between a case pending on the file of a District Magistrate and one on the file of a subordinate Magistrate in the matter of transfer to another district. I would add that, both as a Judge of this Court and formerly as a District Magistrate, I was always under the impression, and acted upon that impression, that when a criminal case was transferred by the High Court from any Court in one district to another district, that transfer in no way limited the jurisdiction of the District Magistrate to whom the case was transferred to act under the provisions of s. 192 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. That opinion I still entertain, but, as I have already said, I am willing in future to adopt the practice suggested by the learned Chief Justice.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, BURKITT, and AIKMAN, JJ.—The defendant, who is respondent to this second appeal, held a decree obtained from a Rent Court against one Parmeshri Das. The decree was dated the 5th of November 1891. In execution of that decree a grove was attached and put up for sale. Sometime after attachment, the appellant, Sahu Lachmi Narain put in an objection before the Rent Court executing the decree and claimed that the grove which had been attached was his own. The objection is not before us, but it has not been shown to us that the Rent Court did not, as it was bound to do, examine the objector or his agent. We assume, therefore, that the Rent Court did act according to law, and we know from the record that the 18th of November was fixed for the disposal of the objection. On the 18th of November the parties appeared. The objector stated that he had not had sufficient [254] time to produce certain evidence which he wished to produce. He asked for an adjournment, and this case was adjourned until the 28th of November, with the warning that if he did not then produce his evidence, his claim would be dismissed. He did not appear on the 28th. The Court waited till the 29th, and again till the 30th, and then on the 30th, as he did not appear, his claim was rejected for want of prosecution. On the 23rd of January 1895, the present suit was instituted by the appellant, asking that the auction-sale which had taken place in the interim might be declared ineffective and inoperative. Both the lower Courts have dismissed the suit as barred by the limitation rule set out in clause (b) of s. 181 of the Rent Act. The plaintiff now in second appeal urges that the Courts below were wrong in holding the suit to be barred by limitation. He contends that there was no adjudication upon his claim under s. 179 of the Rent Act, and that, therefore, limitation cannot be deemed to run from the date of the order of the 30th November, 1893. In support of his contention, he cites the case of Kallu Mal v. Brown (1).

The point raised by this contention is one which in our opinion is fully covered by the precedent Sardhari Lal v. Ambika Pershad (2). In that case their Lordships of the Privy Council remarked that they did not know what had taken place before the Subordinate Judge who made the order, but they go on to observe that, whatever may have happened, "there was an order rejecting the claim brought. It was an order within the jurisdiction of the Court that made it." Their Lordships go on to point out:—"It is not conclusive; a suit may be brought to claim the property, notwithstanding the order; but then the law of limitation says that the plaintiff must be prompt in bringing his suit. The policy of the Act evidently is to secure the speedy settlement of questions of title raised at execution sales, and for that reason a year is fixed as the time within which the suit must be brought." The same remarks apply here. For cases like the present, s. 181, clause (b) of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, No. XII of 1881, [255] supplies the limitation rule and clearly requires that a suit brought in the civil court to set aside an order passed against an objector must be brought by that objector within one year from the date of the order if he seeks to establish his right to the property claimed by him in the Rent Court. Again we have the cases Khub Lal v. Ram Lochun Koer (3), Kaminee Debia v. Issur Chunder Roy Chowdhry (4), and Sadut Ali v. Ram Dhone Misser (5). These two latter cases are directly in point.

As regards the case cited on behalf of the appellant, the facts do not appear to be very fully stated. If it were the intention of the learned Judges who decided that case to lay down that, when an opportunity has been given to an objector to establish his claim and he fails to do so and his objection is thereupon disallowed, he can still bring the same claim after the expiry of the year prescribed by article 11, schedule ii, of the Indian Limitation Act, we should find ourselves unable to follow their decision.

In the present case the claimant came forward asserting his right. The burden of proof was upon him. He was given full opportunity of substantiating his right, but he failed to do so. The order passed was clearly an order adjudicating upon his claim within the meaning of s. 179 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, and was an adjudication by a competent Court upon such materials as were before it, and to it as such the limitation rule laid down in clause (b) of s. 181 clearly applies. The suit was properly held to be barred. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

The holder of a decree for pre-emption paid the decreed pre-emptive price into Court. A creditor of the decree-holder applied for attachment of the money so paid in, and ultimately was allowed by the Court to withdraw a portion of it. After the decree for pre-emption had been confirmed in appeal, the pre-emptor applied for possession, of the pre-empted property. Held, that the decree-holder was entitled to obtain possession, and that it was not competent to the Court to pay out to anyone but the person entitled to it under the decree for pre-emption any portion of the pre-emptive price, so long as the decree for pre-emption was not modified or reversed in appeal.

THE respondent to this appeal, Hakim Wilayat Ali Khan, obtained a decree for pre-emption, conditional on his paying into Court on or before the 24th of February, 1890, the sum of Rs. 5,290. On the 21st of January, 1890, the decree-holder paid the whole of this amount into Court. The defendant vendee appealed to the High Court. That appeal was decided on the 23rd of May 1892. The High Court substantially affirmed the decree of the Court below. The wording of the High Court's decree was as follows:—"It is ordered and decreed that this appeal be dismissed, that the decree of the Additional Judge of Moradabad be confirmed with this proviso, that upon the aforesaid plaintiff respondent paying into Court the sum of Rs. 5,290, the purchase money, and Rs. 1-9-8, the amount of proportionate costs, aggregating Rs. 5,291-9-8, on or before thirty days from the 23rd of May 1892, being the date of the decree of this Court, he do obtain possession of the property in suit as detailed and specified in the decree of the lower Court, and that the appellants aforesaid and the other defendant in the suit do pay the aforesaid plaintiff respondent the sum of Rs. 285-11-9, the costs recoverable by him in the lower Courts. And it is further ordered that if the [257] aforesaid plaintiff respondent fails to pay the said sum of Rs. 5,291-9-8 within the time as hereinbefore mentioned, his suit shall stand dismissed, and he shall have to pay the aforesaid defendant appellant the sum of Rs. 365-3, the amount of costs incurred by them in this Court and in the lower Court." The decree-holder did not pay in the additional sum of Rs. 1-9-8, but he claimed to set it off against the costs awarded to him. Whilst the appeal was pending in the High Court, one Shadi Ram, who held a decree against Wilayat Ali Khan for Rs. 1243-15-10, applied for execution of his decree by attachment of that amount out of the sum of Rs. 5,290 which had been paid in by the pre-emptor for payment to the vendee. The District Judge, without giving any notice of this application to Wilayat Ali Khan, ordered the amount to be paid to Shadi Ram out of the said deposit. Notice of Shadi Ram's application was given to the vendee, but he made no objections to the application being granted. When Wilayat

* Appeal No. 5 of 1895, under section 10 of the Letters Patent.

Ali Khan applied for possession in execution of his decree, he was met by two objections on the part of vendee, (1) that the pre-emptor had not paid in the balance of Rs. 1-9-8, and (2) that the pre-emption money having been diminished by the sum drawn out by Shadi Ram was no longer sufficient.

The District Judge held that the decree-holder had failed to comply with the terms of the decree of the High Court, and dismissed his application for execution. The decree-holder appealed to the High Court.

This appeal coming before a single Judge was decreed on the ground that the decree-holder had complied with the decree for pre-emption as soon as he had paid in the pre-emption price, and that the subsequent action of the lower Court in paying out a portion of it to Shadi Ram ought not to prejudice the right of the decree-holder to possession. As for the question of the non-payment of the sum of Rs. 1-9-8, the single Judge held with reference to Ishri v. Gopal Saran (1) that the decree-holder was entitled to set off the amount against the costs payable to him.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and KNOX, J.—The plaintiff in pre-emption paid into Court the amount to satisfy the pre-emptive price and costs, but he appealed to the High Court against the amount decreed. An ingenious creditor of the plaintiff presented an application for the attachment of part of the money paid into Court, and extraordinary to say, he found a Judge who made an order on his application allowing it. Thereupon the amount which he claimed, amounting to Rs. 1,243, was paid out of Court, neither the defendants nor the plaintiff consenting. The plaintiff's appeal was dismissed. He thereupon demanded possession. He was met with the objection that there was not enough money in Court to pay the decretal amount. That was quite true, but it was not the plaintiff's fault. He had complied with the law. It was the fault of the Judge who allowed any one except the defendant in the suit to draw any part of the money out of Court. The plaintiff appealed to this Court, and our brother Aikman, rightly holding that the plaintiff had complied with the decree in pre-emption, held that he was entitled to possession. There cannot be any doubt about it. Whether the unfortunate vendor or vendee, as the case may be, defendant in the pre-emption suit, has now any remedy to get this Rs. 1,243, to which he was lawfully entitled, we need not say. Money paid into Court in a suit cannot be taken out of Court by a creditor of the man who pays it in so long as the suit is pending, or unless the result is that the person who paid it in is held entitled to withdraw the money or some part of it, and then the creditor of the person who paid it in can only have execution against so much of that money as his judgment-debtor would be entitled to take out of Court. Money paid into Court by plaintiff in pre-emption to be paid over in a certain event to the defendant in the suit is in custody of the Court until the result of the litigation is known. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

YARO (Defendant) v. SANA-ULLAH (Plaintiff).^{*}
[21st January, 1897.]

Easement—Light and air—Injunction or damages—Act No. 1 of 1877 (Specific Relief Act), s. 54.

It was not intended by s. 54 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, that a man should not have an injunction granted to him unless his property would otherwise be practically destroyed if the injunction were not granted.

Where the plaintiff had for over twenty years carried on the business of manufacturing a particular kind of cloth in a certain house, and the defendant built in the neighbourhood of that house in such a manner as to render the plaintiff's house practically useless for the purposes of his manufacture, it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction and not merely to damages. Aynsley v. Glover (1) and Holland v. Worley (2) followed. Dhunjibhoy Cawasji Umrigar v. Lisboa (3) and Ghanasham Nilkant Nadkarni v. Moroba Ram Chandra Pai (4) referred to,

THE plaintiff was a weaver carrying on his business in the city of Benares. The defendant owned a house separated from the plaintiff's work-room by a narrow lane. The defendant proceeded to rebuild the wall of his house which was opposite to the plaintiff's house, and built it nearer to the plaintiff's windows than it had been before, whereby, according to the plaintiff, the light coming to the windows of the plaintiff's work-room was intercepted and the plaintiff's business was interfered with. The plaintiff accordingly sued for the demolition of the new wall which had been built by the defendant.

[260] The defendant denied that the plaintiff had acquired any easement of light in respect of his work-room, and denied that he had built the wall in dispute nearer to the plaintiff's house than it was formerly, or that it in any way interfered with the access of light to the plaintiff's windows.

The lower appellate Court (Additional Munsif of Benares) found that the defendant had built his new wall closer to the plaintiff's house than the old one was, but that such action had not interfered with the plaintiff's light, and dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed. The lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Benares) found that the plaintiff had acquired an easement of light, which was materially interfered with by the defendant's new wall, and made a decree in favour of the plaintiff for the demolition of the defendant's wall.

The defendant appealed to the High Court and his appeal, coming before a single Judge of the Court, was dismissed. The defendant thereupon appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

Babu Satya Chandar Mukerji, for the appellant.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and KNOX, J.—This was a suit for an injunction. The plaintiff had been entitled to light and air to the full extent of his window for over twenty years. He carried on the business of a manufacturer of kincob at Benares. The defendant proceeded to build a wall which would have the effect practically of reducing the plaintiff's light to such an extent that he could not carry on his business. The lower appellate Court granted an injunction. It is said in appeal here that the lower appellate Court had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction because it could have awarded damages; and the decision in Dhunjibhoy Cowasji Umrigar v. Lisboa (1) and Ghanasham Nilkant Nadkarni v. Moroba Ram Chandra Pai (2) were relied on. In our opinion the rule of law in such cases was correctly laid down by Sir George Jessel in Aynsley v. Glover (3) and by the late Mr. Justice Pearson in Holland v. [261] Worley (4). In our opinion it was never intended by the Legislature that a man should not get an injunction unless his property would be practically destroyed if the injunction were not granted. Here there was substantial injury and wrongful injury to the plaintiff's rights. The plaintiff was entitled to the injunction which he got. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

SRI KISHEN LAL (Defendant) v. ATMA RAM (Plaintiff).^{*}
[22nd January, 1897.]

Principal and agent—Lambardar and co-sharer—Lambardar collecting rents for co-sharer—Suit by pre-emptor to recover profits accruing between the date of his decree and the time when he obtained mutation of names.

Held that a pre-emptor who had obtained a decree for pre-emption in respect of a share in a pure zamindari village could not successfully maintain a suit against the judgment-debtor co-sharer for the profits of the pre-empted share accruing between the date of the original decree and the date of his obtaining mutation of names, such profits having been collected by the lambardar but not paid over to the judgment-debtor; inasmuch as neither could the lambardar be considered as an agent of the co-sharer, whose possession of the profits was the possession of his principal, nor was there any obligation on the co-sharer to collect the profits and hold them to the use of the plaintiff.

IN this case Atma Ram, the plaintiff, brought a suit for pre-emption of certain property of which Sri Kishen the defendant was the vendee. The suit was decreed, and the decree became final in December 1891, when the case was decided by the appellate Court. The plaintiff had, however, in March 1890 deposited in Court the pre-emptive price according to the decree of the Court of first instance.

The suit, out of which this appeal has arisen, was brought by the pre-emptor Atma Ram to recover from the vendee profits of [262] the pre-empted property from the time when he paid in the pre-emption price down to the date of his actually getting mutation of names in his favour on the 10th of May 1882.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Phaphund) dismissed the suit, finding that the profits claimed had never been received by the vendee, but that they had remained in the hands of the lambardar, from whom the plaintiff might, if he had chosen to take the necessary steps, have recovered them.

The plaintiff appealed, and the lower appellate Court (Additional Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) dismissed the appeal and confirmed the decree of the Munsif.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to the High Court. The appeal came before a single Judge, who, on the finding that so long as the pre-emptor had not got mutation of names in his favour the vendee alone could realize the profits, and that the vendee was in default in allowing those profits to remain in the hands of his agent the lambardar, decreed the appeal.

From the judgment of the single Judge the defendant-vendee appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

Babu Satya Chandar Mukerji, for the appellant.

Babu Bans Gopal, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—This was a suit to recover money, which, it was alleged by the plaintiff, the defendant ought to have received from a lambardar. The facts are simple. The plaintiff in this suit was a co sharer in a village in which the custom of pre-emption prevailed. The village was a pure zamindari village. Another co-sharer sold a fractional share in the village to the defendant to this suit, who is the appellant in this appeal. Thereupon the present plaintiff brought a suit for pre-emption against the present defendant-appellant, and on the 4th of March, 1890, obtained a decree for pre-emption conditional on his paying within one month into Court the decreed pre-emptive price and certain costs. On the 14th of March, 1890, the present plaintiff paid the decretal amount into the Court. The present defendant appealed against the decree for pre-emption. His appeal was dismissed in December, [263] 1891, and there was no further appeal. On the 10th of May, 1892, the present plaintiff obtained mutation of names in respect of the share which he had pre-empted, and on the 12th of September, 1893, he instituted the present suit for the profits of the share between the 14th of March 1890 and the 10th of May 1892.

The profits of the pre-empted share had been received in due course by the lambardar of the village and had not been paid over either to the plaintiff or the defendant, and neither of them had brought any suit against the lambardar for profits.

The plaintiff says that the defendant was under an obligation, on the facts stated, to realize from the lambardar by suit or otherwise the share of the profits in respect of the pre-empted share, and he claims to recover that share from the defendant by this suit.

The suit was dismissed by the first Court. The plaintiff's appeal was dismissed by the Court of first appeal. He then brought an appeal to this Court from the decree of the Court of first appeal. His appeal was decided by a Judge sitting singly. The Judge decreed the appeal, holding that the defendant was the only person who could have compelled the lambardar to pay the profits. The learned Judge was also of opinion that the lambardar was in law the agent for the defendant and that the defendant was liable because he allowed the profits to remain in the pocket of his agent.

In my opinion a lambardar is for some purposes the agent of the co-sharers, but it is quite clear to me that he is not an agent of the same kind as an ordinary agent appointed to collect rents. In the case of such an ordinary agent appointed to collect rents, the person who appoints him would be liable for any wrongful acts done in the course of his employment, but that is not the position between a co-sharer and a lambardar. In my opinion it is not correct to say that rents received by a lambardar and not paid out by him in the distribution of profits are held by him under circumstances which would make a co-sharer liable for any misfeasance of the lambardar in the disposition of the rents. It is somewhat difficult to express, but what I mean is that the lambardar is not such an [264] agent for the co-sharers as would make it true in law to say that the rents received by him were in the hands of the co-sharers.

On the other point, as to whether this defendant could or could not have compelled the lambardar to pay over to him the profits of his share, I express no opinion. I think it safer to reserve my consideration of that question until it actually arises and has to be determined, and I do not think it is necessary to determine it in this case, for this reason, that it appears to me immaterial whether this defendant was or was not the only person who could have compelled the lambardar to pay over to him the profits of the share. The defendant had not received any of the profits of the share. The share was not represented by lands in the possession of the defendant out of which he could have made a profit: it merely was represented by a fractional share in a zamindari village. No question of mesne profits could arise; and, in order to hold that the defendant was liable under the circumstances, it would be necessary to show that there was, either by statute law or by contract or by general principles of jurisprudence, an obligation cast upon the defendant to collect these profits from the lambardar and to hold them for the plaintiff. The statute law, so far as I am aware, imposes no such obligation. The statute law enables a plaintiff, as in this case, to avail himself to the full of the decree which he has obtained, but it does not compel a defendant to act as trustee or as an agent for the plaintiff while the plaintiff is sleeping over his rights under the decree. There is no question of any contract between the parties out of which an obligation could arise, and, upon general principles, as the only possession of the property which the defendant could have had was the receipt of the profits which the defendant did not receive, and, as I am unaware that the unsuccessful defendant in a suit is obliged to act as the agent for the successful plaintiff to collect what the plaintiff may be entitled to collect himself, I cannot see where any obligation arose.

I would allow this appeal, and, setting aside the decree of this Court, I would dismiss the appeal to this Court, with costs of this appeal and of the appeal to this Court, and restore and affirm the decree of the Court of first appeal.

[265] KNOX, J.—I concur in what the learned Chief Justice has just said that the defendant in this case is not liable. The plaintiff got his decree in March, 1890, which he could at once have enforced, and under which he could have taken possession. He did not do so, and he seeks to make the defendant vendee liable on the ground that the defendant was in possession and had the opportunity of realizing the profits. As a matter of fact, it has been found that the defendant received no profits at all, and I doubt whether he could in any case have recovered them from the lambardar. In any case I hold that he was not liable. I would allow this appeal, and concur in the order proposed.

BANERJI, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion as the learned Chief Justice and have nothing to add.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur with the learned Chief Justice in thinking that this appeal should be allowed. It seems to me that what led the learned Judge who decided the appeal to this Court to adopt the view which he took was the impression in his mind, as set forth in his judgment, that the defendant alone could compel the lambardar to pay to him the profits for which the plaintiff sues. If this view were correct, much could be said in support of the learned Judge's decision. But it seems to me to be a mistake to say that the defendant in this case was the only one who could compel the lambardar, in whose hands the profits were, to pay them. It is extremely doubtful whether he could have compelled the lambardar to pay. My own view is that a suit by the defendant-vendee whilst the decree dispossessing him was in force would certainly have failed. But, in any case, I would hold that the plaintiff could have recovered the profits from the lambardar had he taken the proper steps. By the force of the decree which the plaintiff had obtained, and by his payment into Court of the purchase-money on the 14th of March 1890, his title to the possession of the property, so far as the first Court was concerned, became from the date of payment absolute. It is true that the defendant vendee did file an appeal against the decree in the pre-emption suit, but that fact alone would not have prevented the successful plaintiff from [266] obtaining possession. The suit is to recover profits for the period which elapsed between the date on which the plaintiff paid the pre-emptive price into Court and the date on which he got his name recorded in the revenue papers. It is true that, until he got his name recorded in the revenue papers, he could not have maintained a suit in a Court of Revenue for the profits, but I cannot see that there was anything to prevent him suing the lambardar in a Civil Court to recover these profits. The tenure of the vendee after the pre-emptor had paid the money into Court was, it must be admitted, of a most precarious nature, as he might any day have been ousted by the decree-holder. Under these circumstances, I fail to see that he was under any obligation to take steps to realize from the lambardar the profits of the share, which had ceased to be his; and, as I have said above, my opinion is that the lambardar might have successfully resisted any attempt by him to realize these profits. The lambardar was not an agent for Sri Kishen, the defendant, personally, but was only an agent for him whilst he was a co-sharer in the village, and, when he ceased to be such, any agency which might previously have existed came to an end. For these reasons, I concur in thinking that this appeal should be decreed, and I concur in the order proposed.

BY THE COURT.—We allow this appeal, and, setting aside the decree of this Court, we dismiss the appeal to this Court, with costs of this appeal and of the appeal to this Court, and restore and affirm the decree of the Court of first appeal.

[On appeal from the High Court at Allahabad.]

NAWAB IBRAHIM ALI KHAN (Defendant) v. UMMAT-UL ZOHRA (Plaintiff).
[20th November and 9th December, 1896.]

Evidence—Muhammadan law—Alleged gift by a Muhammadan father to his son.

Government securities were indorsed and delivered by a Muhammadan father to his son in the presence of the local Treasury Officer. On the question, raised after the father's death, whether this was intended to transfer the ownership, or was a benami transaction, leaving the true ownership in the father, the courts below had drawn different inferences from the proved facts. The first Court decided that the ownership had been changed, the notes having been given with only a reservation of the temporary use of the interest. The High Court found that the ownership remained in the father.

On a review of the position of the parties at the time, and of their subsequent conduct down to the father's death, the Judicial Committee affirmed the judgment of the High Court, on the evidence, pointing out that the first Court's theory of the reservation differed from the case alleged by the defendant and from that actually made out by the plaintiff at the hearing.

APPEAL from a decree (27th February 1894) of the High Court, reversing a decree (30th September 1891) of the Subordinate Judge of Agra.

This suit was brought by Begam Ummat-ul-Zohra to obtain, against her elder brother, her share, valued at Rs. 21,679, of the estate left by their father, Nawab General Muhammad Hasan Khan.

The question on this appeal was whether certain Government promissory notes, and cash representing them, were part of the estate of the Nawab at his death, or, by reason of their having been given by him while living to his son, belonged to the latter.

The late Nawab made a will, as to which the facts are stated, as well as all the other facts in the case, in their Lordships' judgment.

There were other children of the late Nawab, another son, and another daughter, besides the plaintiff and the defendant.

On the 28th September the late Nawab executed a power appointing his elder son his agent to draw the interest on the [268] promissory notes and to get them renewed. On the 5th March 1885, he indorsed and delivered them to his elder son in the presence of the Treasury Officer at Agra. They were renewed in the name of that son on the 21st March in the same year, and retained by him in his possession.

On the 25th June 1886 the father died. The promissory notes, or their value in cash, Rs. 1,01,000, were the only part of his estate yielding any income, and rest of his property was of little value as compared with this part of it. In 1887 suits were brought by the daughter, Hazrat Begum and the son, Muhammad Ali Mirza, to have the notes declared part of their father's estate. These suits ended in a compromise by which the plaintiffs got decrees for parts of their respective claims. By agreement of the parties to the present suit, instituted by the Begum Ummat-ul Zohra on the 5th July 1890, the evidence taken in those suits was treated as evidence in the present one. The defendant's case was that the whole of the Rs. 1,01,000 had been transferred to him as a gift followed by delivery, and was complete by law. The Subordinate Judge, having framed an issue upon this defence found that the transfer of the 5th March 1885, by the father to the son, was not a merely formal proceeding by which it was not intended to vest the property in him but was an actually operating gift, accompanied by possession of the principal money. This gift had been subject to certain reservations of the interest upon the notes for the donor's lifetime, and after his death for certain stipends payable out of that interest. The Judge found that the notes did not form part of the estate left by the father; and decreed the plaintiff's claim only for her proportionate share in the sale proceeds of a house and moveables, with other rights of property, the value of such share amounting only to Rs. 1,757. He directed that each party should pay their own costs. His judgment referred to Nawab Umjad Ally Khan v. Mohumdee Begum (1), decided in 1867, a case which had been relied on for the defence. The judgment stated that to be a case [269] in which the father had transferred to his only son Government papers by indorsing them to the son, but had reserved to himself the use of interest thereon during his lifetime. On that state of things it had been held by this Committee that the father intended to transfer the promissory notes with the above reservation, and that, under the circumstances, the validity of the intended transfer was not affected thereby.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, and the defendant filed a cross-objection to obtain his costs.

A division Bench (TYRRELL and BLAIR, JJ.) found "that the defendant was not the exclusive owner of the promissory notes once belonging to his father; and that in June 1886 the whole of the notes formed part of an unalienated estate of General Muhammad Hasan Khan." The appeal was decreed with costs in both Courts, and the defendant's objection dismissed.

On this appeal, Mr. H. Cowell and Mr. G. E. A. Ross for the appellant argued that the indorsement and delivery of the notes passed the title thereto, in accordance with Act XXVI of 1881, s. 50; and that the presumption, in the absence of proof of their having been subjected to a trust for the donor, was that the beneficial interest therein passed to the donee. The case of Nawab Umjad Ally Khan v. Mohumdee Begum (1) showed that by Muhammadan law a valid gift could be made with a reservation by the donor for himself. Here the evidence was that a reservation was made of the usufruct, not continuing, but only for the life of the donor, and until certain payments should have been made after his death. Till then the gift would be of the principal. That, on the other hand, a mere nominal transfer should have been made, was not borne out by the evidence, express declarations by the father having been made which would be inconsistent with that intention on his part. Inferences from his conduct did not outweigh his own expressions, and such inferences were consistent only with the reservation by him of a temporary, and limited, interest for himself and his own purposes.

Afterwards, on the 9th December, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD HOBHOUSE.

JUDGMENT.

The appellant in this case, who was the defendant in the original suit, is the eldest son of the late Nawab General Muhammad Hasan Khan, who in these proceedings has been commonly called "The General." The respondent, who was plaintiff below, and who does not now appear, is his eldest daughter. He died on the 25th June 1886, leaving also another son and another daughter. This suit was instituted by the plaintiff to obtain her legal share of the General's estate. The defendant does not dispute her right to that, but as regards a sum of Rs 1,01,000 secured by Government promissory notes, and a sum of cash the produce of those notes, he contends that they form no part of the General's estate, but are his own property by virtue of a gift made by the General in his lifetime.

The other son and daughter also sued for their shares, and were met by the same plea. They obtained decrees in their favour from the then Subordinate Judge of Agra, but pending appeals to the High Court compromises were effected; and these previous suits are of no importance now except for the circumstance that evidence taken in them has by consent been used in this suit.

As regards the overt acts of the parties there is not much dispute; but the Courts below have drawn different inferences from the proved facts. Notes of the stated value were undoubtedly transferred by the General to the defendant on the 5th March 1885, and were afterwards renewed by the defendant in his own name. The question is whether this transaction was intended to be a transfer of the true ownership or was a benami transaction, leaving the true ownership in the General. To determine that it is necessary to see, first, what was the position of the parties at the time, and, secondly, how they conducted themselves between that time and the General's death.

It is mentioned by both the Courts below that in the year 1876, the General executed a registered deed conveying to the defendant [271] his whole property, including the promissory notes. In the former suits the defendant rested his title on that deed. But it was shown that at the same time the General made a will, showing that his heirs were still to get their shares out of the transferred property. The defendant then gave up his claim under that deed, and he has not renewed it. But he and his legal adviser Mr. Willis have in their evidence represented the General's endorsement of the notes as being a completion of the gift left imperfect by the transfer-deed of 1876. The High Court on the other hand have referred to the same transfer as showing that the General then intended that a transfer, on the face of it complete, should not interfere with the claims of his other heirs.

On the 28th September 1880, the General executed a deed by which he appointed the defendant to be his attorney in the Treasury Office at Agra to realize interest under promissory notes, and to get the specified notes renewed. The defendant after that drew the interest, but the General had the disposal of it. Such was the position of affairs up to the 5th March 1885. It should be added that the notes were at this date, and continued to be, the sole source of income, to the General. He had some other property, but it produced no income, and it was worth less than Rs. 20,000 to sell. It is also clear that the General had become very infirm in more than one way.

The only material witnesses who speak to the circumstances of the endorsement are the defendant himself, his pleader Mr. Willis, and Mr. Hollingbery the Treasury officer in whose presence it was made. There is indeed another witness called, one of the clerks of the Treasury, who professes to have been present, and who relates particulars more in the defendant's favour. But his story is on the face of it suspicious; it is not consistent with the accounts either of the defendants or of Hollingbery; and both the lower Courts pass it over in silence. Their Lordships do the same.

Mr. Willis was consulted by the General about his affairs at various times prior to March 1885. He was informed of the [272] transfer-deed of 1876, and of the power-of-attorney. He pointed out that endorsement was required for complete transfer of the notes. Then he says:—

"I suggested to him that after he had endorsed the promissory notes "he should make over possession of the notes to his son, Ibrahim Ali Khan, and in the presence of Mr. Hollingbery and his son to say that "he had gifted them to him of his own free will, and that they formed his "exclusive property, and that neither the General nor his heirs or relatives "have any claim or right over them. From what I knew of the Muham- "madan law I thought that that would be sufficient for a gift."

The defendant says that he and his father went alone to Hollingbery's office and stayed half an hour. He further states:—

"When my father went to Mr. Hollingbery there was no talk with "him, but when my father's hand was shaking at the time of signing "Mr. Hollingbery said to me 'Guide your father's hand.' In reply to the "question regarding the conversation which the witness' father had in "the office before Mr. Hollingbery, in respect of the gift (the witness, "stated): 'This conversation did not take place between me and my "father, but it took place between my father and Mr. Hollingbery. "My father was asked by Mr. Hollingbery whether he wanted to give "the notes in gift, and my father replied, yes, he wanted to give them "in gift. This conversation took place in English. My father could "speak broken English. I was all the time sitting there quite silent.'"

A little afterwards he says: "All that Mr. Hollingbery said to me is "what I have stated above in English. Besides this there was a talk n "English between my father and Mr. Hollingbery, and what is usual in "a gift was also done."

The defendant's examination extended over eight days between the 22nd of November 1887 and the 11th of January 1888. He gave the evidence above quoted on the 28th of November. By the 10th of January it occurred to him to say something more. On that day he was examined by Willis and answered a question about the endorsements. The following is the Judge's note:—

[273] "After having given this answer to the question, he also added: "He made them over before Mr. Hollingbery, the Deputy Collector, and "said: I make a gift of these to Muhammad Ibrahim Ali Khan. They "belong to him, and in them I or any member of the family has no "right."

Their Lordships cannot believe that the defendant did not give at first a full account of what was said: or that the important addition he made six weeks afterwards was not a repetition of what was said by or to Mr. Willis, rather than of his father's declaration.

Mr. Hollingbery was examined on the 19th January 1888. He deposes as follows:—

"General Muhammad Hasan Khan appeared before me when he signed the endorsements. I cannot recollect what conversation passed between us at the time. I remember his son (pointing to Ibrahim Ali Khan) was with him at the time. I remember so far that I understood the transferor to say that, owing to his extreme old age, he had transferred the notes to his son. Judging from the renewal certificate, the son must have taken renewed Government notes instead of these. General Muhammad Hasan Khan signed the endorsement in my presence. He did so in my official capacity as Treasury Officer.

"To Court (Mr. Ball):—To the best of my recollection the General signed the endorsements unaided. If any one had held his hand, and he had written with his assistance, I would have refused, or at least certainly noted that fact in making the certificate."

He was examined again on commission in this suit, but added nothing. It is clear that he knew nothing about the important declaration comprised in the defendant's afterthought.

If the history of the case stopped at this moment, it would present some doubtful considerations. In 1876 the notes were the subject of a benami transfer to the defendant. In 1880 he received power to draw the interest, but when drawn it was distributed by the General. In 1885 the General under Willis' advice perfected the legal transfer to the defendant. He did so, as Hollingbery [274] understood from him, on account of his extreme old age. Old age may be a good cause for transferring such dominion as enables the transferee to deal with others; but whether it would induce the General to strip himself bare, and to leave himself and the rest of his family at the mercy of his eldest son is another consideration. If, as Willis avers, he was then advised to make a formal public declaration disclaiming all interest for himself and his heirs, he did not do it. Considering the extreme readiness of Indian owners of property to admit the idea of benami transfers, and considering what the General had already done with this very property, it would be at least very doubtful whether the transaction of 1885 was not of the same character with that of 1876. Then comes the question what light is thrown on the transaction by the subsequent conduct of the parties.

Immediately after the endorsement the General set about making a will, which was prepared by Mr. Willis. That gentleman tells us that the General and the defendant came to his office, where the parties conferred.

"The General wound up by saying: 'Bear witness, Mr. Willis, that I have gifted the notes to Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, and that these are his property and that neither I nor my khandan have any right or claim over them.' These words he repeated twice. On both occasions the eldest son, Ibrahim Ali Khan, had come with his father."

He is substantially corroborated by the defendant. If these declarations could be taken as they are stated, and as being a true expression of the General's mind, they would be very important. But they are so inconsistent with the overt acts which followed that they cannot be relied on ; and neither of the Courts below has relied on them.

The will was duly prepared, and on the 15th of July it was signed. By it the General gives all his property to the defendant, subject to payments which he directs the defendant to consider as a trust or charge on the property bequeathed. These payments consist of life annuities amounting to Rs. 1,700 a year, and of [275] annuities and other payments, either in absolute perpetuity or of a permanent nature, amounting to Rs. 910 a year. The defendant says that his income from the notes is about Rs. 3,662 a year. Making full allowance for the facts that life annuities to the extent of Rs. 420 a year, given to the defendant's wife and daughters, may be discontinued at his discretion, and that there was some property which, though producing no income, might be sold to meet part of the charges, it is clear that the General looked to the notes as the source of payment. Willis can suggest no other source. He says :—" I have heard of nothing else yielding an " income except these promissory notes. The will mentions no source from " where the monthly allowances and other charges were to be paid. I " cannot suggest any other income but the interest of the notes. The " Government promissory notes were excluded from the description of the " properties given in the will. I asked the General from what source these " charges and allowances were to be paid. He said his son would pay " them from his own income. At that time I did not know if Ibrahim " Ali Khan had any income independently of the notes. Do you now " know if he had any ? I don't know." It is impossible to believe that the General looked on the defendant as the true owner of the notes when he was making so large an inroad on them. The defendant says that the will was read out in his presence, and that he did not object to any of the clauses in it. In point of fact the will has never been treated as valid in law. Its importance consists in the light it throws on the intentions of the General.

Then comes another important piece of evidence. The General was in the habit of making out monthly statements of amounts payable to his family and servants, from himself downwards, and of paying those amounts. That practice was continued after the endorsement just the same as before. So far as the recipients could see or know, the money remained the money of the General.

Being examined on this point on the 24th November the defendant said :—" The members of the family and servants used [276] " to receive " their pay from my father, i.e., he used to pay them with his own hand. " So long as he was alive he sent for the servants and the members of the " family and the relations, and paid them with his own hands." That is quite intelligible if the General remained the master of the income ; otherwise not so easily intelligible.

Between the 24th November and the 11th January the defendant, probably being advised that his statement was damaging to him, sought to modify it. In answer to his own pleader, Willis, he says :—

" Dr. Mukand Lal was our family doctor. I used to pay his money " and used to have it paid by my father. Out of reverence and respect, I " used to have it paid through him. Similarly, after the transfer of the " notes, I used to pay the monthly allowances fixed for my brother and " other members of the family as well as the servants ; but I used to have " the payment made through my father. Besides reverence and respect,

"there was this special reason for making payments through my father, that if money had not been paid through his hands, those persons should not have obeyed his orders."

"Q.—Is there any special reason why they should not have obeyed his order?"

"A.—He had transferred the notes to me."

The truth of those assertions it is impossible to test. As far as overt acts went, the General remained paymaster to the end.

The Subordinate Judge, not the same official who tried the previous cases, found in favour of the defendant. He thought indeed that the facts subsequent to the endorsement of the notes tell against the defendant. But he held that they admit of explanation. His theory is that the General, though giving away the notes, reserved to himself the right of using the interest during his lifetime and of charging the income with certain bequests to be paid after his death. He made a decree accordingly, giving the plaintiff her share of the general estate, but no part of the notes or cash.

[277] The High Court came to a different conclusion. They point out that the Subordinate Judge's explanation is a mere theory without evidence. Their Lordships add that it is against the evidence of the defendant and his pleader. Their case throughout has been that the gift was complete on the 5th of March 1885. Both were examined closely upon the circumstances of the endorsement, and both asserted an absolute gift divesting the General of all interest in the notes. From beginning to end, neither in pleading nor in evidence, do they give a hint of the very peculiar, and very vague, bargain now suggested. The case actually made has in the judgment of both Courts broken down. It is hardly right to invent a new case when the judgment comes to be delivered. At all events there is no material evidence except such as has been stated above. In their Lordship's judgment the conduct of the parties after the endorsement removes every doubt which might otherwise have affected that transaction, and leaves it certain that the General remained the true owner of the notes.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss this appeal and affirm the decree of the High Court.

defence that the estate had been jointly held for religious and charitable purposes under a will, the deceased having had no beneficial, or heritable, interest. The defendant alleged that the original owner of the property had bequeathed the property in trust for these purposes. The claimant alleged a revocation of the will, and denied that there was such a trust.

The judgment of the High Court, decreeing the claim, observed that, even assuming that there had been a trust under the will, recognised by the deceased and the defendant, the property which had come into their possession had been [278] by them appropriated, from the first, to their own purposes, and had been so long held by them adversely to the trust title, that the defendant could not now allege that there was no beneficial interest transmissible by inheritance. Upon this the Judicial Committee pointed out that no trustee could have actually acquired a title, by such an appropriation against the trust. Indian Trusts Act 1882, sections 63 and 64. They added that, at the same time, the judgment of the High Court had come to the right conclusion, for the will, and the trust alleged had not been established.

One of the contentions upon this appeal was that the plaintiff was estopped from denying the existence of a trust by there having been a judgment of the High Court, in a prior suit, between the present defendant and the widow of the deceased, that judgment having stated that the trust had been recognised by him who was now defendant.

Held, that this was not within section 13, Civil Procedure, the matter not having been tried and determined in that suit.

Held, also that another prior judgment, in a suit brought by others interested in the trust, which judgment found the will to have been revoked, was admissible, though not conclusive, evidence against him.

APPEAL from a decree (6th June 1889) of the High Court, affirming a decree (10th December 1887) of the Subordinate Judge of Benares.

In this suit (24th March 1886) the present respondent sued Sheodial Tewari, also called Bachcha Tewari, and so named in the judgment, who died on the 12th June 1895, pending this appeal, and who was now represented by his widow, Bitto Kunwar. A co-defendant, Raja Ajit Singh, was a purchaser of some of the property in suit. The claim, valued at Rs. 54,000, was that the plaintiff, on the death of Mitho Kuar, widow of his cousin Ram Kishen Misr, had inherited a half-share of revenue-paying villages in the Jaunpur, Azamgarh, Ghazipur and Benares Districts with houses in Benares. That share had been held by Ram Kishen Misr at his death and was now in the possession of the defendant Bachcha Tewari. The whole had been acquired by Ram Kishen's maternal grandfather, Bhawani Prasad Tewari, conjointly with his brother Devi Prasad Tewari. The brother died before Bhawani, who died in 1842, leaving no legitimate offspring.

The principal question raised on this appeal was whether or not the share sued for was subject to a trust for religious and [279] charitable purposes, under a will made by Bhawani in 1842. If so subject, there would have been no transmissible right in Ram Kishen.

The plaintiff made title thus:—Baijnath Misr, father of his first cousin Ram Kishen Misr, had married a wife, of the Tewari family, Sodha Kuar, daughter of Lachho, sister of Bhawani Prasad Tewari. Ram Kishen Misr was their son. Thus Ram Kishen was on his mother's side, great nephew of Bhawani.

The relationship is thus shown :—

The defendant Bachcha Tewari was the grandson of Hemnath Tewari, brother to Kaulapat Tewari, father of Bhawani; to whom, therefore, Bachcha Tewari was first cousin, once removed.

After the death of Bhawani, his brother's, Debi Prasad's widows, Rani Kuar and Dharma Kuar, together with his sister's grandson, Ram Kishen Mistr, possessed the property, keeping up a temple to Mahadeo, and a bhandara, or rest-house for devotees, both of which Bhawani Prasad had founded. Disputes having arisen, as to the right to inherit the estate, between those persons and Bachcha Tewari, an agreement was arrived at, and executed on [280] the 4th January 1850. The agreement recited that, on the death of Bhawani Prasad, his brother's two widows had adopted Ram Kishen, and made over all the zemindari documents to him, and that, on Dharma Kuar's death, Rani Kuar had her own and the name of Ram Kishen entered, and they were in possession; that a dispute had arisen with this appellant, a cousin of Bhawani Prasad, and to avoid further quarrels they had settled the matter by agreeing that Ram Kishen should be the owner of one-half and this appellant of the other half of all the property; that the name of Ram Kishen should continue as the lambardar; and the name of this appellant should be substituted for that of Rani Kuar; the management of the ilaka remaining with Ram Kishen. "He should manage the ilaka either by direct management or by a lease, and after paying the Government revenue meet the family expenses, the bhandara expenses, the expenses of the servants and others as fixed since the time of the deceased Tewari, our common ancestor."

This appellant contracted not to transfer his half-share; alleged that there had been no mismanagement on the part of Ram Kishen; "as the expenses, &c., have been fixed by our ancestor" with reference to the produce of the ilakas; in future, too, Ram Kishen was not to be called upon to render accounts.

Also the agreement stipulated:—"We further agree that Lala Avadh Lal, who is an old agent appointed by our ancestors, shall

C.W.N. 265. Ramkishen died on the 22nd of January 1870, being at that time the recorded joint proprietor with Bachcha Tewari. Mussammat Mitho, his widow, succeeded for her widow's estate to Ramkishen's share. She died in 1884. On her death Kesho Prasad Misr claimed in this suit, as cousin of Ramkishen, to be entitled as reversioner to the half-share held by him.

[281] The plaint alleged that the will of 1842 had been revoked by the testator; and that the widows and Ramkishen, who lived as a joint family, had obtained proprietary possession, keeping up the temple, but taking the surplus income. The plaintiff's construction of the agreement of 4th of January 1850 was that Ram Kishen and Bachcha Tewari were to be the proprietors, holding possession in equal shares.

The written answer of the defendant was to the effect that the will had not been revoked, but had been acted on. The appointment of Avadh Lal to be the executor was insisted on, and the recognition of his authority by the agreement of the 4th of January 1850, as constituting a recognition of the trust.

The issues raised the principal question, what right had Ram Kishen possessed? Was the will revoked?

At the hearing several records, of which the principal were the following, were put in evidence:—

The decision of a Division Bench was given on the 27th of February 1878 as follows:—

"The agreement recognized the will of Bhawani Prasad Tewari, "vested the estates in Ramkishen and Bachcha Tewari as trustees to carry "out the provisions of the will, and secured to Ramkishen the manage"ment of the property, including the right to raise the necessary funds
"by zar-i-peshgi (mortgage); but there was no provision either that the right "of management or the right of mortgage should devolve on his heirs.
"Consequently, Musammat Mitho Kuar was not competent to charge the "estate, and the appellant is entitled to the relief claimed by him," and so allowed the appeal with costs.

A suit was brought in 1880 by the managers of the temple, founded by Bhawani Prasad Tewari, against Bachcha Tewari and a mortgagee from him, to set aside the mortgage.

Bachcha Tewari did not appear to defend.

The Judge found that the suit was collusive and that the will had been revoked. A majority of the Judges of the Bench which considered this case, after a difference of opinion between the [282] Judges of a Division Bench on the case, found that the will had not been proved to have been in existence at the death of the alleged testator. The particulars fully appear in their Lordships' judgment.

In the present suit the Subordinate Judge found that Bachcha Tewari and Ram Kishen Misr had been in possession of the estate left by Bhawani in equal shares.

He was of opinion that the agreement did not recognize the will, and did not constitute Ram Kishen a trustee. He held that the plaintiff was not estopped by the decree of February 27th, 1878, the High Court having in a later suit decided against the will.

The High Court (EDGE, C.J., and TYRRELL, J.) on appeal, affirmed this decision, giving judgment as follows:—

"It appears to us that, in 1850, when Ram Kishen and the defendant took this property and executed the deed of the 4th of January 1850, they were plainly taking the property for their own purposes, and not for the purposes of the trust, and that they never had any intention of acting as trustees, or holding the property otherwise than as adversely to the trusts of the will. The deed of 1850, although it alludes to some expenses which were to be met as theretofore, was a deed by which those two, as far as they could, appropriated the trust property to their own private uses.

"There is ample evidence on this record that those parties never intended to deal with the property as trust property, and that they were from a very early period acting adversely to the trusts of the will. We may refer to the petition of the present defendant of February 4th, 1856 (document No. 352 on the record), as an example. That was a petition for partition, and there the present defendant represented that he was entitled to a moiety of the property in his own right, and that Ram Kishen was entitled to the other moiety. He says, as one ground for his request to have the property partitioned, that as the mahal was joint there was generally a risk of its being sold by auction or farmed out. Here we have one of the so-called trustees, asking [283] for a partition of the trust property on account of the inconvenience which arose from its being held jointly with his co-trustee. We are of opinion, unless we are bound by the judgment of February 27th, 1878, that Ram Kishen and the defendant never held or volunteered to hold in any sense as trustees, and that in fact their holding was from the first adverse to the trust title. Does then the judgment of February 27th, 1878, conclude this question? It appears to us, for two reasons, that it does not. That was a suit in which the present defendant sued Musammât Mitho and her mortgagees for a declaration that she had no right to mortgage, and that the mortgages were invalid. Looking at his plaint and his supplementary statement, we find that he did allege that the will of 1842 had been executed, and that he did so set up that will with the object only of showing that under it Musammât Mitho had no power to mortgage—a contention which was perfectly correct, independently of any question of trusteeship. He did not there raise any question of trust property or trusteeship. He went on to set up what was, on paper at least, the foundation of his titles; that was the deed of January 4th, 1850. He could not have set up the foundation of his title, the will of 1842, because his title and his enjoyment were in violation of the terms of that will. Apparently, the will was alluded to, either as a matter of history, or to show that the annuitants under that will had no power to assign. So far as the will was concerned, the defences of the defendants put the will aside, either as a document which was immaterial, or as a will which had been revoked. That is the effect of the pleadings in that suit, so far as is material. The Subordinate Judge framed six issues in that suit. The sixth issue, which was 'whether the will made by Bhawani Prasad was in force, or whether he revoked the deed in his lifetime,' was the only issue which apparently referred to the will. That issue does not suggest any question in relation to trust or trusteeship, and obviously from his judgment, Rai Bakhtawar Singh, the then Subordinate Judge, did not consider that any question of trusteeship was before him. He looked at the will to see whether [284] the widows of Bhawani Prasad and Debi Prasad were entitled or forbidden to transfer. From the decree in that suit the present defendant, Sheo Dial, appealed. There was nothing in his grounds of appeal to suggest any question of trust or trusteeship, and so, as far we can see, no question of that kind was raised in the suit until the Judges of this Court construed the deed of 1850 as a deed which vested the estate in Ram Kishen and the present defendant as trustees to carry out the provisions of the will. The real question before them was whether, under the deed of 1850, Musammat Mitho, as the childless widow of Ram Kishen, could mortgage the property, or any part of it. The deed of 1850 certainly does not purport to vest the estate in Ram Kishen and the now defendant as trustees to carry out the provisions of the will, nor did it purport on the face of it to recognise the will of 1842. We are of opinion that the finding as to trusteeship of this Court in the judgment of February 27th, 1878, was not an issue which the parties had raised or intended to raise; that it was not raised in the Court of first instance, and, if raised at all, was raised for the first time when those learned Judges were delivering their judgment. Under these circumstances, we are of opinion that the judgment of February 27th 1878, has not concluded this matter. It is possible that this question of trusteeship was introduced into the judgment owing to the fact that, on January 21st, 1876, one of those Judges had considered that Musammat Mitho Kuar and the now defendant could not, by the deed of 1850 alone, destroy the trust created by Bhawani Prasad. We have been pressed with certain cases, viz., Katama Natchier v. The Raja of Shivagunga (1); Nand Kumar v. Radha Kuar (2); and Brammoye Dasse v. Kristo Mohun Mookerjee (3). These cases would, of course, only apply if the finding of February 27th, 1878, was a finding upon a matter in issue in that suit. The cases to which we have been referred were all prior to the passing of the Specific Relief Act of 1877, and s. 43 of that Act is the second ground on which we hold that the finding [285] of the 27th February 1878 is not binding as between the parties here. We have said that the plaintiff here does not claim through Musammat Mitho at all. He claims through her husband an estate which, he says, he became entitled to on her death. We have not thought it necessary, and indeed the points were not argued at any length before us, to consider whether the alleged will of 1842 ever was revoked. The majority of a Full Bench of this Court has found against it, and the defendant himself executed a mortgage, which was in issue in another suit, and in which he alleged it was waste-paper. We dismiss the appeal with costs."

On this appeal, preferred by Bachcha Tewari and continued by his widow.

Mr. C. W. Arathoon, for the appellant, argued that there was error in the decisions below, and that it should have been decided that Ram Kishen Misr and Bachcha Tewari were not competent, if even they had ever intended—a fact which was wrongly found below—to appropriate the property and bring the trust to an end. The agreement of 1850, on its true construction, recognised that the property had been rendered subject to a trust, and on their taking possession they had become bound by the requirements of that trust. Moreover, the appellant could rely upon the decision of the 27th of February 1878, as well as on an earlier judgment, that the will was in operation, and that the property was subject to the trust. The judgment of the High Court in 1878 constituted the matter to be res judicata. The decision, which was adverse to the appellant, at which a majority of the Judges of the Bench had arrived in 1885 was passed in a suit which the Subordinate Judge had found to be collusive, and upon which the present appellant's husband had not appeared to defend. The latter decision was in no way binding upon the appellant. It was, further, a strong point in favour of the existence of the trust that there was no evidence of the revocation, or the alleged destruction of it by the testator himself. It had been set up by Ram Kishen, as well as others, and the evidence went far to show that some at least of its provisions had been carried out.

JUDGMENT.

[286] The respondent did not appear. On a subsequent day, February 6th, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR R. COUCH.—The present appellant is the widow and heir and legal representative of Sheo Dial alias Bachcha Tewari, the original appellant. On the 24th of March 1886 the respondent brought a suit against him and Raja Ajit Singh, a purchaser from him, to recover possession of property, consisting of houses and lands in the districts of Benares, Jaunpur, Azamgarh, and Ghazipur, of which he was in possession. The respondent in his plaint alleges that on the death of Bhawani Prasad Tewari, the owner of the property in suit, who died in November 1842 without issue, Rani Kuar and Dharma Kuar, the widows of his deceased brother, Debi Prasad Tewari and Ram Kishen Misr, the son of the niece of Bhawani, who lived in commensality with him, obtained proprietary possession of the property left by him. They performed the services and managed the affairs of a temple which had been built by him, and of a bhandara attached to it, and after payment of the expenses of these institutions enjoyed the rest of the income of the property. Some time afterwards, a dispute arose between them and the appellant as to the right of heirship to the deceased; the dispute was settled by an argeement, dated the 4th of January 1850, to the effect that Ram Kishen and the appellant should be the proprietors and should hold possession in equal shares. Ram Kishen was accordingly in joint proprietary possession and enjoyment with the appellant during his life. He died on the 22nd of January 1870 without issue, and his widow, Mitho Kuar, succeeded to the possession of the property as his heir. She died on the 26th of September 1884 and on her death the respondent was the lawful heir to the estate of Ram Kishen. In 1875, in a suit brought by Mitho Kuar against the appellant for half of the profits of one of the mauzas, the appellant set up a will, dated the 7th of August 1842, made by Bhawani, but torn up in his lifetime, and not in existence at the time of his death. The case of Bachcha Tewari in his written statement, so far as it is now material, [287] is that, by the will Bhawani appointed one Avadh Lal to be his executor and entrusted him with the whole estate for charitable and religious purposes, and fixed salaries for the support of his heirs; that Bhawani never tore up or destroyed the will; and that Rani Kuar and Dharma Kuar and Ram Kishen always admitted its existence and validity.

It was not disputed before their Lordships that the respondent is the heir of Ram Kishen. Of the issues settled by the Subordinate Judge, only two are now material: (4) "Of what right had Ram Kishen Misr been in possession?" and (5) "Did Bhawani Prasad Tewari revoke the will which he had made during lifetime, and was it acted upon after his death?" A copy of a will of Bhawani, dated the 27th of August 1842, and registered on the 30th of that month, was filed in the suit. Bhawani having died in? November 1842, the only evidence upon these issues was documentary.

It appears in the judgment of the Subordinate Judge that it was contended before him on behalf of the defendants that the agreement of the 4th of January 1850 recognised the will and constituted Ram Kishen a trustee of the property for certain trusts created by the will, and that the respondent was estopped by a decision of a Division Bench of the High Court dated the 27th of February 1878 from averring that the property was Ram Kishen's own. This decision was in a suit by Bachcha Tewari against Mitho Kuar and three others (two of them mortgagees and the third a purchaser at a sale in execution) to have a mortgage of the property made by her declared invalid, and a sale in execution of a decree thereon cancelled. From the judgment of the Subordinate Judge in the suit Bachcha Tewari appears to have alleged that, under the agreement of January 1850, Ram Kishen was declared proprietor of one-half of the property and he of the other half, the estate being kept joint, and that Mitho Kuar, exceeding her power, had mortgaged the property contrary to the will of the ancestor and the interest of the plaintiff. The 6th issue in that suit was :—"Whether the will made by Bhawani Prasad was enforced or [288] whether he revoked the deed in his lifetime?" The Judge did not decide this issue, saying that as Ram Kishen transferred half of the share to Bachcha Tewari and he had made certain transfers to Babu Balgobind, he had no right to say that under the will the heir of Ram Kishen had no power to transfer. A decree was made in favour of Bachcha Tewari for a half share only of the house and villages in dispute. He appealed to the High Court, which decreed the appeal on the ground that the agreement recognised that the will of Bhawani Prasad Tewari vested the estates in Ram Kishen and Bachcha Tewari as trustees to carry out the provisions of the will, and secured to Ram Kishen the management of the property, including the right to raise the necessary funds by mortgage, and consequently that Mitho Kuar was not competent to charge the estate. The question whether the agreement had this effect had not been raised either in the Lower Court or in the grounds of appeal, and there was no issue upon it. This statement is therefore not within s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The parties to the agreement, Rani Kuar, Ram Kishen, and Bachcha Tewari are described in it as heirs of Bhawani, and it purports to be made upon a dispute in respect to the property owing to the claim of Bachcha Tewari as cousin of Debi Prasad Tewari, the of husband Rani Kuar and in direct lineal descent with him, and to avoid the property being wasted by litigation. It contains no reference to any will of Bhawani or to any trusts under such a will. The property is to be held by Ram Kishen and Bachcha Tewari in equal shares, but is to remain joint, and the provisions are naturally such as would be made in that case. Their Lordships are of opinion that the agreement does not recognise any trust.

There is another suit which has a very material bearing upon the question in this case. In 1880, a suit was instituted by two persons, who are described in the plaint as managers of the Chetr Bhandara of the late Bhawani Prasad Tewari, against Balgobind Das and Bachcha Tewari, which is described in the [289] judgment of the Judge of Jaunpur as a claim for a declaration of right by removal of unlawful possession of debts by annulment of a miscellaneous order of the Subordinate Judge. It appears that on the 4th of September 1877, Bachcha Tewari had made a mortgage of the property now in dispute to Balgobind who had obtained a decree upon it, and had the property put up for sale in execution of the decree. The 1st and 2nd of the issues in that suit were—“(1) Was the property in suit bequeathed for public charitable purposes? (2) Was the will revoked by the testator in his lifetime?” Upon these the Judge found that the estate was not bequeathed for charitable purposes and that the will was revoked. The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court at Allahabad and the Divisional Bench of two Judges by whom the appeal was first heard differing in opinion, it was heard by a Full Bench consisting of the Chief Justice and four Judges, the majority of whom affirmed the judgment of the lower Court and dismissed the appeal. This decision is not conclusive against Bachcha Tewari, as the suit was not between the same parties as the present suit, but their Lordships agree with the Subordinate Judge that it was admissible as evidence against him.

The Subordinate Judge with this evidence before him having found on the 4th and 5th issues in the present suit that Ram Kishen had been in possession as proprietor by virtue of the agreement of 1850 and that the will of Bhawani was revoked by him in his lifetime made a decree for the plaintiff. The respondent and the defendant Bachcha Tewari appealed to the High Court. They dismissed the appeal. Their Lordships upon the evidence which has been referred to agree in that result as if Bhawani left no will, the property was not proved to be subject to any trust. But they feel called upon to make some observations upon the judgment of the High Court, in order that it may not be thought that they agree in the reasons given by the learned Judges. The Subordinate Judge having found that the will was revoked by Bhawani, the issue whether it was revoked was the first that should have been decided as it went to the root of the defence. Instead [290] of deciding this issue, the learned Judges begin by saying: “Assuming without deciding the question that that will was really made and was not revoked, Bhawani Prasad by it bequeathed certain annuities and created trusts for religious and charitable purposes and devoted property to those purposes,” and, after stating some facts not now material, they say it had been contended on behalf of the appellant that Ram Kishen and he took the property in question, that it was trust property, and having taken with notice and without having given any consideration for it to the trustee or to any person entitled to deal with it, they must be held to have voluntarily taken upon themselves the trust created by the will of 1842, and that the question of trusteeship was concluded by the judgment of 27th February 1878. Then they say: “It appears to us that in 1850, when Ram Kishen and the defendant took this property and executed the deed of 4th January 1850, they were plainly taking the property for their own purposes and not for the purposes of the trust, and that they never had any intention of acting as trustees or holding the property otherwise than as adversely to the trusts of the will. The deed of 1850, although it alludes to some expenses which were to be met as theretofore, was a deed by which those two gentlemen so far as they could appropriated the trust property to their own private uses. There is ample evidence on this record that those parties never intended to deal with the property as trust property, and that they were from a very early period acting adversely to the trusts of the will.” Further on, they say: “We are of opinion unless we are bound by the judgment of February 27th, 1878, that Ram Kishen and the defendant never held or volunteered to hold in "any sense as trustees, and that in fact their holding was from the first adverse to the trust title." They then proceed to consider that judgment and decide that they were not bound by it. Their Lordships are of the same opinion upon this question.

A judgment of the High Court of the 21st January, 1876, was relied upon in the present appeal for the appellant. It does not [291] appear to have been considered by either of the lower Courts, and clearly does not decide the question whether there was a trust.

The learned Judges of the High Court appear to their Lordships to have been of opinion that assuming that there was a will, and it was not revoked, Bachcha Tewari and Ram Kishen could appropriate the trust property to their own private uses, and that they did so and held adversely to the trust title and themselves acquired a title. At the end of their judgment they say: "We have not thought it necessary and indeed the points were not argued at any length before us to consider whether the alleged will of 1842 ever was revoked." Their Lordships can only understand their thinking thus by supposing they were of opinion that although there might be a trust, Bachcha Tewari and Ram Kishen might acquire a title by having possession of the property and appropriating it to their own use. The learned Judges appear not to have had in their minds the statement of the law in ss. 63 and 64 of the Indian Trusts Act, 1882. They have refrained from considering the fundamental question in the case, whether there was a trust, but having, though by an erroneous process, arrived at the right conclusion and dismissed the appeal before them, their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm their decree and to dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

REVISIONAL CRIMINAL.

Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice.

IN THE MATTER OF THE PETITION OF GUDAR SINGH.*
[9th February, 1897.]

Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 110, 117—Security for good behaviour—Transfer—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 526.

Where a Magistrate instituting proceedings against a person under s. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure has "acted" within the meaning of s. 117 of the Code, no order can be made subsequently under s. 526 of the Code transferring the case from his Court.

[F., 30 A. 47=A.W.N. (1907) 263=7 Cr. L.J. 214.]

[292] PROCEEDINGS under s. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure had been started against Gudar Singh and some others in the Court of a Magistrate of the first-class exercising jurisdiction within the Meerut district. When the case came on for hearing, two of the persons against whom the said proceedings were taken, admitted the facts alleged against them and offered to find security. Thereupon, although no evidence had up to that time been recorded against Gudar Singh, the

* Criminal Miscellaneous No. 8 of 1897.

Magistrate, according to Gudar Singh's affidavit, informed him that unless he also admitted his guilt and furnished the necessary securities he would be dealt with severely and would be sent to jail. Upon this Gudar Singh applied to the High Court for the transfer of the proceedings pending against him to the Court of some other Magistrate.

Mr. W. Wallach, for the applicant.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

The following order was passed:—

ORDER.

EDGE, C.J.—A Magistrate of the first-class having taken proceedings under s. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure against Gudar Singh and others, is said, in the course of those proceedings and before evidence had been taken, to have stated in Court that unless Gudar Singh admitted his guilt and furnished the necessary security, he would be dealt with severely and would be sent to jail. I have taken that statement from the third paragraph of an affidavit which was sworn by Gudar Singh, and which has been filed in support of an application to transfer the case to some other Magistrate. No explanation has been offered, and no denial made that such words were used, on the part of the Magistrate concerned. Under these circumstances, there having been an opportunity for the making of an explanation or a denial, I am forced to conclude that the Magistrate concerned did threaten Gudar Singh that he would be dealt with severely and sent to jail if he did not admit his guilt and furnish security. No man charged with any criminal offence or quasi-criminal offence is bound or is under any obligation to make any admission injurious to his own interests. It is needless to say that no judicial officer should [293] attempt to compel any accused person to make any admission detrimental to his interests. As a matter of fact the procedure invariably in England is to inform the accused that he may make a statement, but that any statement he may make may be given in evidence against him. Having regard to s. 117 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and to the fact that the Magistrate concerned has 'acted' within the meaning of that section, it appears to me that I have got no power to make an order of transfer, and that also is the opinion of other Judges of this Court whom I have consulted in the matter. What I have power to do is to quash the proceedings, so far as Gudar Singh is concerned, and I accordingly make an order quashing the proceedings in question so far as Gudar Singh is concerned. This order will not prevent fresh proceedings being taken against Gudar Singh by any Magistrate other than the Magistrate referred to in the affidavit of Gudar Singh.

Held that a copy of an order passed by a Municipal Board on a petition presented to it, and certified as a true copy by the Secretary to the Board, came within art. 22 of the first schedule to the Indian Stamp Act, 1879, and required to be stamped.

The Secretary of a Municipal Board is a public officer within the meaning of art. 22 of the first schedule to the Indian Stamp Act, 1879, for the purposes indicated therein.

THIS was a reference made under s. 46 of the Indian Stamp Act, 1879, by the Board of Revenue for the North-Western Provinces of the question whether a copy of an order passed by a Municipal Board, such copy being certified by the Secretary of the [294] Board, required to be stamped under art. 22 of the first schedule to the Indian Stamp Act, 1879. The facts which gave rise to the reference are sufficiently stated in the opinion given by the Court.

Mr. E. Chamier, for the Board of Revenue.

OPINION.

The opinion of the Court (EDGE, C.J., KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.) on the question referred was delivered by—

EDGE, C.J.—One Subhan presented a petition to the Municipal Board of Allahabad, asking permission to erect a tiled shed and to keep a house for storing wood on certain land within the jurisdiction of the Municipal Board. On that petition action was taken by the Municipal Board, and certain orders were passed by the department of the Board to which such questions were delegated. Later on Subhan applied to the Secretary of the Board for, and obtained a copy of his petition and the order passed by the Board thereon. That copy was certified as correct by the Secretary of the Board. That copy was produced by Subhan and put in evidence in a Magistrate's Court. The Board of Revenue for these Provinces has referred to us the question whether the copy, which was given upon plain paper and bore no stamp, came within art. 22 of the first schedule to the Indian Stamp Act. It was not a copy chargeable with duty under the law relating to court fees. The question turns in our opinion on the point as to whether or not the Secretary of the Municipal Board was, in certifying the copy to be a true copy, a public officer.

The question is not free from difficulty and doubt. The term "public officer" is not defined in the Stamp Act. We may say that, in our opinion, in a fiscal Act, which imposes the payment of duty on the subject, ought to contain definitions of all terms which have to be considered in applying the Act, and which are not accepted as well recognised terms of universal application. For instance, under the Indian Penal Code, apparently, the Secretary of a Municipal Board would be a public servant, but he would not be a public officer as that term is defined in the Code of Civil Procedure. On turning to the Evidence Act we find that, by clause v of s. 78, the record of the proceedings of a Municipal [295] body in British India is a 'public document.' Curiously the word 'record' is not used in the clause, which merely enacts that the proceedings of a Municipal body in British India are within the meaning of public documents. Clause v of s. 78 brings the record of the proceedings of a Municipal body in British India within clause 2 of sub-section (1) of s. 74, as the record of the acts of an official body. Turning to s. 76 we find that "every public officer having the custody of a public document which any person has a right to inspect shall give that person a copy on payment, &c." According to the explanation to s. 76, "Any officer who, by the ordinary course of his official duty, is authorized to deliver such copies, shall be deemed to have the custody of such documents within the meaning of this section." Working back from that we find that the record of the proceedings of a Municipal Board is public document, and the officer who is authorized by the ordinary course of his official duties to give copies of public documents is for these purposes a public officer. Now the Secretary of a Municipality is an officer who by the ordinary course of his official duty is authorized to deliver copies of the public documents of which he has the custody as Secretary. Our answer is that the copy in question came within art. 22 of sch. 1 of the Indian Stamp Act and required an eight-anna stamp. We wish to guard ourselves against it being considered that we have decided that the Secretary of a Municipal Board is, for any other purposes than that of certifying copies or extracts of public documents, a public officer. Our opinion will be communicated to the Board of Revenue.

* Miscellaneous No. 131 of 1896.

[N.B.—This case appears with the following name in 17 A.W.N. (1897) 61—In the matter of the petition of Subhan.]

BIJAI BAHADUR SINGH (Decree-holder) v. BHUP INDAR BAHADUR SINGH (Judgment-debtor).* [11th February, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code, s. 211—Execution of decree—Mesne profits—Interpretation of decree awarding "future mesne profits."

A decree for possession of immovable property was passed by the District Judge of Mirzapur on the 12th of November, 1887, in favour of a plaintiff declaring that "the plaintiff is also entitled to mesne profits." That decree was affirmed by an order of Her Majesty in Council, dated the 11th of May, 1895, without variation in respect of the order as to mesne profits. Possession of the immovable property to which the decree related was obtained by the decree-holder on the 30th of November 1895.

Held, that the decree of Privy Council was to be construed as a decree awarding mesne profits up to the date when possession was obtained and from the date of the institution of the suit. *Fakharuddin Mahomed Ahsan v. THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.
Mr. B. E. O'Connor, Pandit Sundar Lal and Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, for the appellant.
Messrs. C. Dillon and E. A. Howard, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—In this case the appellant-decree-holder obtained by order of Her Majesty in Council a decree for possession of certain immoveable property, possession of which he has obtained.

The order of Her Majesty in Council reversed a decree of this Court and affirmed a decree, dated November 12th, 1887, of the District Judge of Mirzapur. That decree, with respect to mesne profits, was in these words:—"The plaintiff is also entitled to future mesne profits." So, whatever be the meaning of those words, they were wholly affirmed by the order of Her Majesty in Council, [297] which, referring to the decree of the District Judge, contains these words:—"That the same be and is hereby affirmed."

On proceedings taken under s. 610 of the Code of Civil Procedure the District Judge, referring to ss. 244 and 211 of the Code of Civil Procedure, has held that the decree-holder is entitled under the decree of Her Majesty in Council to recover mesne profits for a period of three years only from the date of the decree of the District Judge, i.e., from the 12th of November, 1887. He holds that "the power of the Court giving the decree was limited by that section (211); it could not give mesne profits for a longer period, and the vague terms actually used in the decree—'that the plaintiff is also entitled to future mesne profits'—cannot give the decree further effect than is allowed by law under that section." But the learned Judge failed to explain why he assumed the date of the decree from which the three years were to be counted to be November 12th, 1887, the date of the decree of the Court of first instance, and not May 11th, 1895, which is the date of the order of Her Majesty in Council. We may add here that it was admitted, and very properly admitted, and indeed it could not be denied, that the only operative decree, and the only decree which could be executed in this matter, was Her Majesty's order of May 11th, 1895.

The decree-holder appeals from the order of the Court below restricting the mesne profits recoverable by him to a period of three years. His contention is that under the order of May 11th, 1895, he is entitled to recover mesne profits from the date of the institution of the suit up to the date of the order in Council, and thenceforward, future mesne profits either up to the date when he was put in possession in execution of that order, or until the expiration of three years from the date of that order, whichever event may first occur. Admittedly he obtained possession on November 30th, 1895, and he therefore asks for mesne profits up to that date.

For the respondent it is contended that there is no decree for mesne profits capable of execution. His learned counsel urged that the decree is defective in that it was not drawn up in [298] accordance with s. 211 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it does not prescribe the period for which mesne profits are recoverable. He drew our attention to the law (s. 196 of Act No. VIII of 1859), as it stood before the present Civil Procedure Code was passed, and argued that, though a decree for mesne profits unlimited as to period was allowable under the former law, a decree under the present Code for mesne profits is bad and inoperative if it does not specify the period for which the mesne profits are to be recovered.

For the appellant we were referred to the case of Fakharuddin Mahomed Ahsan v. Official Trustee of Bengal (1) in which their Lordships, approving of two cases in 12 Weekly Reporter and 22 Weekly Reporter, held that the proper interpretation to be put on a decree which gave "possession with wasilat" was that it was a decree for wasilat (mesne profits) up to the time when possession was delivered. The words used by the District Judge in his decree, which has been adopted by their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the present case are similar in effect to those in the case from 8 Indian Appeals cited above. In accordance with the decision in that case we hold that the proper interpretation to put on the decree for mesne profits, which we are now considering, is that it is a decree for mesne profits up to date of possession. It was contended that the case just cited was inapplicable, as it was founded on and interpreted a section of the repealed Code of Civil Procedure. In that contention we cannot concur. Section 211 practically reproduces s. 196 of Act No. VIII of 1859, in empowering a Court to subjoin a decree for future mesne profits to a decree for possession of immoveable property. The only difference is that under the former Code the decree for mesne profits might have been for an unlimited term, while under s. 211 of the present Code two alternative limits are fixed for the period during which mesne profits can be given. The interpretation we have adopted is precisely similar to the interpretation put by the High Court of Calcutta on an order passed under ss. 211 and 212 of the [299] present Code, an order in which no period was prescribed for which mesne profits were to be payable. See Puran Chand v. Roy Radha Kishen (2).

For the above reasons we hold that we have before us an operative decree for mesne profits.

Further, the learned counsel for the respondents contended that, if there were in this case an operative decree for mesne profits, the Court below was right in not awarding such profits, for more than three years from the date of the decree of the Court of first instance, his reason being, as we understood him, that a regular suit could not have been maintained for more than has been given here.

In our opinion the decision of the Court below is wrong. This appeal has been throughout argued on both sides on the assumption that the case was governed by s. 211 of the Civil Procedure Code. That being so, and it being admitted that the decree to be enforced here is the order in Council of May, 1895, we have to apply s. 211 to the dates and circumstances of this case interpreting the decree in the manner we have indicated above.

Accordingly we find that the appellant is entitled to recover mesne profits from September 23rd, 1886, the date on which the suit was instituted, up to May 11th, 1895, the date of the order in Council, and thereafter from May 11th, 1895, up to the 30th of November, 1895, the date on which the appellant obtained possession in execution of the order in Council.

We accordingly allow this appeal. We set aside the District Judge's finding on the second issue framed by him and his formal order, dated August 3rd, 1896, and we return the record to him with instructions to proceed to determine the amount of mesne profits recoverable by appellant in accordance with our decision. The costs of this appeal will be borne by the respondent.

Hindu law—Hindu widow—Reversioner—Debt incurred by a Hindu widow for legal necessity, but without any charge on the ancestral property in the hands of the widow—Such property not liable in the hands of the reversioners.

The creditors of a Hindu widow cannot after her death have recourse to ancestral property in the hands of the reversioners, in respect of which property the widow had enjoyed only a widow's life-estate, if in fact no instrument charging the property beyond the widow's lifetime has been executed by the widow, even though the debt sued upon was incurred for legal necessity and was one in respect of which such property might have been made liable beyond the widow's lifetime. Shiamanand v. Har Lal (1), Ramasami Mudaliar v. Sellattammal (2), referred to; Ramcoomar Mitter v. Ichamoyi Dasi (3), dissented from.

IN this case one Musammat Lari, a Hindu widow in possession as such widow of immoveable property which had belonged to her husband in his lifetime, borrowed from time to time from the plaintiff to the suit certain sums of money and some grain, the principal portion of the debt being incurred on account of the marriage of her granddaughter. The debt thus incurred was purely a book-debt, and no document of any kind was executed by the widow binding the ancestral property in her hands. On the 16th November 1890 the widow signed a statement of account in the plaintiff's books which showed the amount of the debt to be Rs. 862-7-9. On the 22nd March 1891 the widow died, and the immoveable property above referred to passed into the hands of Manga Ram and Bhairon as heirs of the widow's late husband. On the 11th of April 1892 the plaintiff filed the suit out of which this appeal has arisen, seeking to recover from Manga Ram and Bhairon the amount due to him by Musammat Lari.

The plaintiff's suit was dismissed by the Court of first instance (Munsif of Jhansi) on the ground that the fact of the loan was not proved. On appeal to the District Judge, the District Judge [301] found that the plaint disclosed no cause of action and dismissed the appeal. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court (S. A. No. 237 of 1893), which remanded the case to the lower appellate Court for trial on the merits.

On the retrial the then Officiating District Judge found on one issue alone—that of legal necessity for the loan—and finding that issue against the plaintiff-appellant, dismissed the appeal. The plaintiff again appealed to the High Court.

On this appeal the High Court referred certain issues to the Court below under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure. On these issues the lower appellate Court found that the loan was in fact made and the balance of account struck as alleged by the plaintiff, and that the money was borrowed for legal necessity, but that there was no agreement on the part of Musammat Lari to pay interest.

^{*} Second Appeal, No. 845 of 1894, from a decree of R. Scott, Esq., District Judge of Jhansi, dated the 30th November 1892, confirming a decree of Munshi Sakhawat Ali, Munsif of Jhansi, dated the 15th July 1892.

JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Court (EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.) was delivered by EDGE, C. J.—The plaintiff in this case advanced moneys to the widow of a separated Hindu, partly to defray the expenses of the marriage of her granddaughter, partly for agricultural purposes and to some small extent for the payment of Government revenue. It is found by the Court below that the Hindu widow could and ought to have paid out of her own money the expenses of the marriage of her granddaughter. Our judgment, however, does not turn upon that finding. The defendants to the suit are the reversioners, who have succeeded to the possession of the ancestral property on the death of the widow. The widow gave no mortgage and executed no document which created a charge on the ancestral property in favour of the plaintiff. It is contended that the advance made by him to the Hindu widow of money for agricultural purposes, and for the payment of Government [302] revenue, was an advance made for such necessary purposes as would have enabled the Hindu widow to have made a mortgage of the ancestral property, which would not have been limited to her own interest, and on behalf of the plaintiff the decision in Ramcoomar Mitter v. Ichamoyi Dasi (1) was relied on. If the decision in that case is good law, the plaintiff would be entitled to a decree. On the other side the decision in Ramasami Mudaliar v. Sellattammal (2) and the decision of this Court in Shiamunand v. Har Lal (3) have been relied on.

It appears to us that the case presents no difficulty. The plaintiff, if he had chosen, could, before lending his money, have obtained from the Hindu widow the security of the ancestral property by obtaining a mortgage. He did not choose to demand a mortgage before advancing his money; he accepted the personal liability of the widow. He now seeks to get a decree under which he can bring to sale the ancestral property in the hands of the reversioners. He seeks a decree which would bind that property. In other words, he is seeking a decree in this suit, there being no assets of the widow in the hands of the reversioners, which he could only have obtained if he had had a valid charge on the ancestral property. The plain answer to his suit is that the plaintiff lent his money on the personal liability of the widow, and, the defendants-reversioners having no assets of the widow in their hands, the plaintiff cannot get a decree against them. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

(1897) 52.Criminal Procedure Code, s. 526—Transfer—Magistrate, powers of—View of the scene of the occurrence by a Magistrate trying a criminal case.

It is not only not objectionable, but in many cases highly advisable, that a Magistrate trying a criminal case should himself inspect the scene of the [303] occurrence in order to understand fully the bearing of the evidence given in Court. But if he does so he should be careful not to allow any one on either side to say anything to him which might prejudice his mind one way or the other.

THIS was an application under s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for the transfer of a criminal case based chiefly on the ground that the trying Magistrate had personally inspected the scene of the occurrence out of which the case arose, and was said to have made inquiries relative to the subject of the complaint from persons present at the time of the inspection.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the order of Edge, C.J.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—This is an application under s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to transfer a case from the Court of one Magistrate to the Court of some other Magistrate. It is said in the application that, after examining some of the witnesses for the prosecution, the Deputy Magistrate, before whom the case was, personally inspected the ground and made inquiries relative to the subject of the complaint from persons present at the time of the inspection: also that he expressed a wish that some of the accused should compromise the case. In support of the application the decision in Queen-Empress v. Manikam (1) and Hari Kishore Mitra v. Abdül Baki Miah (2) have been relied on. The Magistrate has stated that he did inspect the place. He has denied that he made any inquiry from any persons except the witnesses in their examination. He has stated that he directed the patwari to prepare a plan.

It appears to me that it never could have been the intention of the Legislature that in a criminal case, in which the evidence was conflicting or was difficult to understand by a person not acquainted with the locality, the Magistrate trying the case should not go and see the locality for himself. It is highly convenient [304] that he should adopt such a course, if the evidence is conflicting or if the guilt or innocence of the party depends upon local peculiarities of situation which cannot be understood except by the Magistrate seeing the place himself. When a Magistrate goes to view a place for the purpose of understanding the evidence, he should be careful not to allow any one either side to say anything to him which might prejudice his mind one way or the other. It would be practically impossible in some cases that the Magistrate should be accompanied by each side. Take the case of a dacoity with, let us say, twenty prisoners. It might become necessary for the Magistrate to see the village in order rightly to appreciate the evidence for the prosecution or the evidence for the defence. It surely could not be the law that the Magistrate should not go and see the village in order to understand the case unless he was accompanied by some one for the Crown and all the twenty dacoits in fetters, they not being represented by any one. In this particular case it appears to me that the Magistrate acted wisely. The question was—Had the shrubs been torn up by the accused, as said by the prosecution, or had they been destroyed by the accumulation of rain, as was said by the defence? It would probably be difficult to decide in such a case, for example, whether six witnesses for the prosecution were to be believed who might say that the shrubs had been destroyed by the accused, or whether six witnesses for the defence were to be believed who might say that an accumulation of rain water had destroyed the shrubs. A Magistrate does not make himself a witness by going to a place and viewing it for the purpose of understanding the evidence, any more than does a Judge in England who goes to view a place, or do jurymen who view a place under an order, make himself or themselves witnesses in the case. It would be seldom that a Magistrate, or a Judge or jury could come to a correct conclusion on conflicting evidence if they did not import into the consideration of the evidence before them, not only common sense, but also common knowledge of what ordinarily passes in life. In this case I do not see that the Magistrate has done anything improper or anything [305] to suggest to my mind that a fair and impartial trial will not be had before him. It is very possible that the accused may think that the Magistrate's mind may have been biased against their case by what he saw on the view. Possibly the view explained to the Magistrate's mind on which side the truth was, and the accused may be under the impression, rightly or wrongly, that the view would support the case for the prosecution and show that the case for the defence was utterly improbable. But the ends of justice are that the truth should be arrived at, and should be arrived at whether an accused person objects to the truth being ascertained or not. I see nothing here to bring this case within s. 526 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I dismiss this application.

On May 29th, 1896, Nand Kishore, who was a patwari, was summoned as a witness in a rent case before a Deputy Collector. He did not bring with him, according to the usual practice in such cases, his copy of the settlement record. The Deputy Collector took his reply in respect of this omission, and he stated that he had not brought it because he had come to Court straight from the tahsil, where he had been engaged in some account business, [306] and had not got it with him. The Deputy Collector discredited this, and in the exercise of the power conferred upon him under the patwari rules, which are framed under the Land Revenue Act, inflicted on the accused a fine of a month's pay.

The accused preferred a formal appeal to the Collector, who directed the Deputy Collector to make a further inquiry into the patwari's allegations. This inquiry was formally made.

The evidence of one of the parties to the rent case was taken on oath, and to make good his case the patwari produced his diary. In that he had altered the entry of the 26th May, which was—"To-day I came from the tahsil into my circle" into—"To-day I wrote the account of my circle in the tahsil."

In respect of this alteration the Collector ordered the prosecution of Nand Kishore, and he was committed to the Sessions Court and convicted under s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment. From this conviction and sentence he appealed to the High Court.

Mr. E. A. Howard, for the appellant.

The Government Pleader (Munshi Ram Prasad), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—The simple question in this case is whether a public servant who does that which, if done to save another from legal punishment, would bring the public servant within s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code has committed the offence punishable under that section if the person whom he intends to save from legal punishment is himself. In our opinion there is no reason why it should be an offence for a public servant to make a false record in order to save another person from legal punishment, and why it should not be an offence for him to make a false record to save himself from legal punishment. If the Legislature had intended that this section should only apply when the intention was to save some person other than the public servant, it would have been easy to insert the word "other" between the words "any" and "person." It appears to us that the appellant, who was a public servant, did not cease to be a person when he made a [307] false entry in his diary for the purpose of saving himself from punishment. Two authorities have been cited to us in this Court. One is that of Queen-Empress v. Gauri Shankar (1) and the other that of Queen-Empress v. Girdhari Lal (2). In our opinion the appellant committed the offence under s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code. We dismiss his appeal.

THIS was a suit in a Court of Small Causes to recover Rs. 426-1-6 as due on an account. The defendants pleaded that the claim was barred by limitation. Mr. Roshan Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The appellant Nazar Ali owned a 2½ biswas share in a certain zamindari. He mortgaged 2 biswas to Tika Ram, the respondent, on the 9th of October, 1878. On the 18th of July, 1890, Tika Ram obtained a decree for the sale of the 2 biswas. He applied for execution of that decree by sale of that share, and the Court ordered the 2 biswas share to be sold. As the property was ancestral property, the Court, under s. 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure, transferred the execution of the decree to the Collector. By some mistake the Collector, on the 20th of August, 1891, sold 2½ biswas instead of the 2 biswas which he had been ordered to sell. The sale was confirmed on the 13th of November, 1891. On the 3rd of September, 1894, the plaintiff [309] instituted the present suit, claiming possession of a ½ biswas share on the ground that that share had not been sold, and further that the sale of that share was null and void. Both the Courts below dismissed the suit, applying to it clause (b) of art. 12 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877.

The plaintiff has preferred this appeal, and it is contended on his behalf that art. 12 is not applicable. In our opinion the appeal must prevail. Where a sale is in its inception void it is not necessary for the plaintiff to have that set aside which is itself a nullity. This view is supported by several rulings, of which we may quote the following:—Ram Lall Moitra v. Bama Sundari Dabia (1) followed by this Court in the case Balwant Rao v. Muhammad Husain (2); Lala Mobaruk Lal v. The Secretary of State for India in Council (3); and Dakhina Churn Chattopadhyaya v. Bilash Chunder Roy (4). In our opinion art. 12 applies to cases in which a sale would be binding on the plaintiff if not set aside. An illustration of such a case is afforded by Mahomed Hossein v. Purundur Mahto (5).

In the case before us, if the Collector who sold the half biswa share claimed had no jurisdiction to sell it, the sale of that share was ab initio void. The power under which the Collector sold the plaintiff's property in execution of Tika Ram's decree was derived from the order made by the Court to which the application for execution was made, and which transferred the decree to Collector under s. 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 321 (c) authorizes the Collector to sell only the property ordered to be sold, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The authority of the Collector was therefore confined to the sale of that property only which he was ordered by the Court to sell. In this case the Court ordered only a 2 biswa share to be sold. The Collector therefore acted ultra vires in bringing to sale any share in excess of 2 biswas. Qua the excess the sale was a nullity, and there was no necessity for the plaintiff to seek to set it aside.

[310] The authorities to which we have referred lay down the proposition that, if the Court which ordered the sale had no jurisdiction to do so, the sale held in pursuance of that order is a nullity. Similarly, if the officer who held the sale had no authority to sell the property, that sale would be equally a void sale. In this case, as we have said, since the Collector had no jurisdiction to sell any share in excess of that which the Court ordered to be sold, the sale of the share in question was void and not binding on the plaintiff. The Lower Appellate Court has relied on an unreported judgment of this Court (S. A. No. 1138 of 1893, decided on the 16th March, 1894.) It does not appear that in that case the Court had acted without jurisdiction, or that the officer who held the sale had gone beyond his authority. The case is therefore clearly distinguishable. The Court of first instance has referred to a ruling of the Madras High Court (Suryanna v. Durgi) (1). That is, no doubt, a ruling which supports the view of the Court below, but we are unable to follow it. We observe that it not only differs from numerous rulings some of which have been cited above, but from one of the same Court (Sadagopa v. Jamuna Bhai Ammal) (2).

We allow the appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the Court below, remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of first instance with directions to re-admit it under its original number in the register and to try it on its merits.

Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

In our opinion our brother Burkitt rightly held that the son of a Mubammadan co-sharer in the village was not, merely in virtue of his birth, a co-sharer, within the meaning of the pre-emptive clause of the wajib-ul-arz. A Mubammadan son does not take a vested interest in ancestral property on his birth, as a Hindu son does. Consequently, the order of remand was right. [30th January, 1897.]

Act No. III of 1867 (Gambling Act), s. 6—Evidence of house being a common gaming house—Instruments of gaming—Cowries.

Held, that the mere finding of cowries in a house searched in pursuance of a warrant issued under Act No. III of 1867 would not raise the presumption [312] that the house was used as a common gaming house; but evidence that cowries were used in that house as instruments whereby to carry on gaming would bring the house within s. 6 of the Act. Queen-Empress v. Bhawani (2), referred to.

THIS was a reference made under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the District Magistrate of Ballia. The house of one of the accused had been searched in pursuance of a warrant issued under s. 5 of Act No. III of 1857, and there was found in the room where the accused were a quantity of cowries. A Deputy Magistrate convicted the accused under s. 4 of Act No. III of 1867, holding that these cowries were instruments of gaming within the meaning of the Act. One of the accused applied for revision of this order to the Magistrate, who, in view of the ruling of the High Court in Queen-Empress v. Bhawani, referred the case to the High Court.

The following order was passed:—

ORDER.

EDGE, C.J., and KNOX, J.—In this particular case, there is evidence that gambling was actually being carried on in the house. Our attention has been drawn to the case of Queen-Empress v. Bhawani (2) in which it was held, on the authority of some previous cases, that "cowries are not instruments of gaming." Ordinarily speaking, it would be incorrect to describe cowries as instruments of gaming, but if cowries are used in a particular case as a means of gaming, they are in that particular case instruments of gaming, at least in our opinion, within the meaning of that term as it appears in Act No. III of 1867. To explain ourselves a little further, the mere finding of cowries in a house would not raise the presumption that the house was used as a common gaming house, but evidence that cowries were used in a particular house as a means whereby to carry on gaming would bring the house within s. 6 of the Act. It entirely depends upon the use to which the cowries are put. If they are used for the purposes of gaming, as they frequently are in this country, they are, when they are shown to be so used, as much instruments of gaming as dice. We decline to interfere in this case. The record will be returned.

GANGA NARAIN (Plaintiff) v. THE MUNICIPAL BOARD OF CAWNPORE (Defendant).^{*} [16th February, 1897.]

Act No. XV of 1883 (N.-W.P. and Oudh Municipalities Act), s. 55, cl. (c)—Municipal Board—Powers of Municipal Boards to frame bye-laws—Act No. XV of 1873, s. 22—Nuisance.

Clause (c) of s. 55 of Act No. XV of 1883 was not intended to empower a Municipal Board to make rules which would enable it to confiscate private rights without making any compensation, or to treat as nuisances acts which are not in law or with regard to public health or convenience capable of being considered nuisances.

The clause was meant to give to Municipal Boards power to make rules for prohibiting the establishment of markets, that is, to prevent new markets being established, and to give them power to control the maintenance of existing markets or of markets which might be established with their sanction.

By "maintenance" is meant the keeping up of a market in such a manner as would make it a fit place for the carrying on of a market having regard to public health and public convenience.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—In this case the plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the Municipal Board of Cawnpore from interfering with the exercise of his right to hold and maintain a market for the sale of vegetables, fruit and other articles within the grounds of a temple of which he was manager. The defence to the suit was that according to certain rules of the Municipal Board the plaintiff had no right to establish or continue a market without the permission of the Municipal Board. It is necessary to see how this suit arose.

The Municipal Board of Cawnpore had established within the Municipality a market for the sale by wholesale of vegetables, [314] fruit and such like things. They had let that market to a contractor. The contractor had by his conduct so disgusted the people who had used the market that they had refused any longer to come to that market, and they had betaken themselves to a market in the cantonments of Cawnpore. One can easily understand that it was not pleasing to the Municipal Board of Cawnpore that the market over which they had spent a considerable amount of money should be abandoned, and that the tolls which they expected to derive from the use of their market should go into other pockets. It is not quite clear how they approached the cantonment authorities of Cawnpore, but they were determined, if they could, to obtain the closing of the market in cantonments, in the hope, no doubt, of compelling the public to return to their own Municipal market. The correspondence between the cantonment authorities and the municipality, if we had it, would probably be instructive. This much we know, that the cantonment authorities having granted a lease of their market to certain contractors were apprehensive that they might be sued for damages if they complied with the request of the Municipal Board, and that they insisted upon having an indemnity bond to secure them against loss by any damages which might be awarded to the persons with whom they were about to break their contract. Whether the cantonment authorities would have been liable in damages or not, and whether or not they had the power to put an end to the lease granted to their contractors are beside the question here. What we know is that the cantonment authorities thought it reasonable that they should get an indemnity bond, and declined to act without it, and that the Municipal Board of Cawnpore authorised the execution of an indemnity bond, and the bond was apparently given, signed by the Chairman. Whether the Municipal Board of Cawnpore intended, if the cantonment authorities were made liable for their breach of contract, to pay the damages out of the public moneys of the Municipal Board of Cawnpore, or whether the members of the Board intended to pay these damages out of their private purses, we do not know. It is probable that an auditor would [315] have surcharged the Municipal Board, and have forced the members of the Board individually to make good the sums, if any, which had been paid under that indemnity bond. Municipal Boards are not entrusted with public moneys in order that they may employ them in inducing other persons to break their lawful contracts. However, the indemnity bond was given; the cantonment market was closed, and thereupon customers who had formerly attended the market of the Municipal Board looked about to see whether they could find another place to sell their goods, and they proceeded to the market which had been held lawfully by the plaintiff within the grounds of the temple for a period of something like twenty-five years.

The Municipal Board by closing the cantonment market had not effected their object; but they were not to be defeated. The indemnity bond was given on the 25th of June, 1892. By the 23rd of July, 1892, the Board awoke to the necessity of closing another market in order to get back their customers, and on this occasion they had no cantonment authorities, who would be willing to close a market on receiving an indemnity, to deal with; they had to deal with the plaintiff in this suit. On the 23rd of July, 1892, they served the plaintiff with the following notice:—"Under order of this date you are directed to discontinue at once, within twenty-four hours, the holding of the bazar established by you without permission, otherwise proceedings will be taken. In case of non-compliance legal steps will be taken in accordance with the rules of the Municipal Board, and no excuse will be heard." That threat was not sufficient: the market continued; and on the 25th of July, 1892, they served on the plaintiff the following notice:—"Under order of this date you are directed to close at once, within twenty-four hours, the bazar Sabzi Mandi (market for the sale of vegetables and fruit) which you have newly established without permission within the enclosure known as that of Prag Narain. Otherwise, in case of non-compliance, legal steps will be taken in accordance with the rules of the Municipal Board (s. 56), and no excuse will be heard." It so happened that the notice of the [316] 23rd July was one which would not fit in with the existing rules of the Municipal Board. The then existing rules of the Municipal Board, even according to the contention of the Board, only gave them power to deal with new markets. It is to be observed that in the notice of the 23rd of July the Board did not suggest that the market was a new one, as in fact it was not; but they were determined to try it on, and accordingly served the notice of the 25th of July, in which they alleged the market to be new. Even that notice did not much frighten the plaintiff, for he continued to hold his market. Thereupon the Municipal Board proceeded to put the criminal law in motion. They did not attempt to prosecute the plaintiff under the Indian Penal Code for conducting a market which was a public nuisance, for in truth it was a well-conducted market and no case of nuisance could be made out, but they proceeded to prosecute his brother, Jamna Narain, who managed for him, under their rules. The case was tried by a Magistrate of another district, this Court having made an order of transfer, and the Magistrate of the other district (Fatehpur), on the 16th of November, 1892, acquitted Jamna Narain on the ground that the market was an old market. One would have thought that that ought to have satisfied the Municipal Board; but it was not so. They were determined not to let the matter drop, and were determined, if they could, to confiscate, in order to benefit their own market, the plaintiff's long acquired right in his market.

Accordingly, in December, 1892, they proceeded to apply to the Local Government for sanction of an amendment of the rule under which they had taken proceedings by leaving out the qualifying word "new" which that rule contained and by practically reverting to the words of a rule which had been made under s. 22 of Act No. XV of 1873, which was a section which gave a committee power to frame rules for declaring what acts or omissions within a Municipality shall be considered to be public nuisances. The old rule, which they practically wished to reinstate, was as follows:—"It was declared that "the establishment or maintenance of a public market, bazar, ganj or slaughter-house, except under such conditions [317] as the Board may from time to time prescribe" was a public nuisance. It has been contended here before us that under s. 22 of Act No. XV of 1873, a Municipal Board had, subject to the sanctioning of their rules by Government, unlimited and uncontrolled discretion to declare any act or any omission within their Municipal boundaries to be a public nuisance, to declare, for instance that a man should not eat his dinner within his house, or that persons should not walk along the streets of Cawnpore with any clothes on; the argument went as far as that. The contention was that the Municipal Board in its discretion or indiscretion, whether for the purposes of public health or for the oppression of traders in Cawnpore, might by a rule declare anything which might happen in Cawnpore to be a nuisance, and that a person not hearkening to such a rule would be liable to a prosecution. In our opinion the Legislature was never so foolish as to intend to give so sweeping a discretion to a Municipal body. Certainly the proceedings in this case, as we shall presently point out, will be a warning, we hope, to the Legislature to be more precise in future in limiting and defining the powers which it grants to Municipal Boards in these Provinces.

Now we have said that in order to close the plaintiff's market the Municipal Board were desirous of getting back to some rule similar to the old one and of striking the limitation "new" out of the then rule. The matter went from the Municipal Board to the then Commissioner of Allahabad, apparently by means of a letter signed by the Chairman of the Board and dated the 6th of January, 1893. in which reference was made to some objections to any alteration of the rule recently taken by the plaintiff. The letter of the Chairman alleges that the insertion of the word "new" in the rule in question he believed was due to a mistake. We believe that it was more probably due to the fact that the High Court at Calcutta in the case of Moran v. The Chairman of Motihari Municipality (1) had pointed out in vigorous, but not too strong, language the lamentable consequences of entrusting Municipal [318] Boards with powers under which they might practically confiscate private rights without making any compensation. The Chairman of the Board, in the letter to which we are referring, says, as to the objection that, if the word "new" is omitted from the rule, the Municipal Board will have authority to remove hundreds of markets from private places and establish them in places fixed by the Municipality, that "it cannot be said that the Board has misused the powers it had in the past." Probably not, before that period and before this case arose, because the Board had not found that the markets and shops of private persons in Cawnpore were in competition with the market which the Board had established. So soon, however, as the Board met with competition, it, in our opinion, misused its supposed powers. Then the Chairman goes on to make a representation as to the facts connected with this market. We cannot believe that he was acting on his own knowledge. We must believe that he was entirely misled by those about him. In fact the language of the sentence which we are about to quote is not the language which an educated Englishman would use. The letter says:—"When the Municipal Board tried to close this market it was heard that they could not do so under the new bye-laws, as for many years a few vegetable sellers had been allowed to sit in the temple compound for the convenience of people frequenting the temple."

It has been found, and we entirely agree with the finding, that the market was an old established market of from twenty to twenty-five years' standing, at which sales, not only by retail but also by wholesale, had been publicly conducted. We regard that description of the market as a false and misleading description. We do not believe that it was false and misleading to the knowledge of the Chairman, but certainly false and misleading to the knowledge of those who were instructing him. Now let us see what was the view that the Local Government took of this matter when it came before it. The Local Government, in reply to the Municipal Board of Cawnpore, says that "the amended rule which has been submitted for sanction really asks sanction for the following [319] proposals:—First, that no private bazar, however old, will be maintained until the sanction of the Board has been obtained; second, the Chairman may be empowered to shut up and close by means of a written notice any private bazar where retail selling is going on, however old and well managed it may be, and however willing its owner may be to carry out all instructions." The Local Government had no difficulty in dividing what the motives and object of the Municipal Board were. Its comment is as follows:—"From the foregoing, it will appear that the Municipal Board should be empowered to withhold sanction to the holding of any particular private bazar at any time it likes without assigning any reason, and without making any compensation to the owner, who may lose his valuable right which he may have acquired by prescription. Furthermore, if the Municipal Board sanctions the holding of any private bazar, and that bazar is subsequently sold for a large value, the Chairman will, even if the conditions prescribed by the Board are fulfilled in that bazar, be empowered at any time he pleases to close the bazar without consulting the Board or taking any evidence or assigning any reason," and it says further that "although the Government does not wish to curtail those powers, still it is quite inadvisable to grant such arbitrary powers to the Board as have been suggested." On that the Chairman of the Municipal Board writes to the Commissioner and informs him that the Board is prepared to modify its request, we presume by leaving out the arbitrary powers of the Chairman, and to simply ask that the bye-law which was in force for years in the Municipality may be sanctioned, "as this bye-law is practically the same as the rule printed at p. 76 of the Government Manual as one of the rules approved by Government."

The Chairman forgot to draw the attention of the Commissioner to the fact that s. 22 of Act No. XV of 1873, under which the old rules or bye-laws had been made, had been most materially altered by s. 56 of Act No. XV of 1883, the Act then in force. The Legislature by 1883 had obviously become aware of the danger of entrusting a power to Municipal Boards under which [320] they could declare any act or omission to do any act to be a nuisance and make a person liable to a prosecution.

The old rule which the Chairman asked the Government practically to re-introduce could not have been re-introduced under Act No. XV of 1883. The Municipal Board had no longer the right or the power, either with or without the sanction of the Local Government, to declare what acts or omissions should be deemed to be nuisances within Municipal limits. S. 56 of Act No. XV of 1883 put the question of nuisance at rest for ever by giving the Board power to interfere only in the case of public nuisance.

How it came to pass we know not, but the Local Government sanctioned the following rule:—"No person shall establish or maintain a public market, bazar, ganj or slaughter-house in any place without the sanction of the Board or except under such conditions as the Board may from time to time prescribe." The Board, having been defeated up to that time in their attempts to confiscate without compensation the private rights and private property of the plaintiff, had now got a rule which, they thought, gave them a free hand, and accordingly they at once proceeded to prosecute the plaintiff again in order to force him to close the market and abandon the competition. That prosecution, we understand, is awaiting the decision of this case.

It has been said to us in this case on behalf of the Board that the Board will make compensation. All we can say is that, seeing how the Board has acted in this case, we should be very sorry to be anywhere in the position of the plaintiff going to the Board for compensation. The plaintiff forwarded a petition against this alteration of the rule to the Governor-General. The Board, we presume, had got their opportunity of representing the facts as they chose, for it is obvious, on looking at the letter of the 5th of February, 1894, from the Government of India to the Secretary to the Government of the North-Western Provinces, that misleading representations as to the facts had been put before the Government of India. It is obvious that it was represented to the Government of India that the selling of vegetables by wholesale in the plaintiff's [321] market was quite recent. That was not a fact. It was represented to the Government of India that if the Municipal Board did close the plaintiff's market under their rules, the plaintiff would have a right to obtain, through the Civil Courts compensation. In one sense that representation was true. If the Municipal Board, having no authority to close the market, did close it, no doubt they would have to pay damages, but if the Municipal Board was right in believing that they had the power to close the market lawfully, no provision had been made, either under the rules or by the Legislature, to compel them to pay one anna of compensation to any person whose rights they might confiscate. The Governor-General in Council decided that he did not consider that the previous practice in respect of this market should be stopped, or that the income derived from it should be confiscated, without a grant of suitable compensation, and the Governor-General in Council expressed an opinion that the new rule, i.e., the altered rule, should be worked with due regard to the custom of the temple and to the rights which had accrued before the rule was framed, and a suggestion was thrown out that it might be possible that a Court of law might not hold that the last rule was retrospective, that is, that the last rule did not apply to a market which was in existence before it was made. So we understand it.

This case came on for trial before the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, who dismissed it on a preliminary point. He was set right upon that point, and then he started to try the case on the merits. He found that there had been no old market there for wholesale. A perusal of his judgment is sufficient to show that he went in that finding entirely against the evidence. The plaintiff's witnesses called by the Board proved the plaintiff's case; but the Subordinate Judge found for the defendants upon the evidence of three witnesses. What he has written about these three witnesses in our opinion shows that he ought not to have depended upon their evidence. The plaintiff appealed. The District Judge of Cawnpore, in a very careful and well considered judgment, found every issue of fact in the plaintiff's favour. He found that this [322] was an old market for retail sales and also for wholesale. He found that it was a well conducted market, against the management of which not one word could be said; and indeed the only thing that can be said in favour of the Municipal Board of Cawnpore is that, with all their determination to ruin the plaintiff, they have not ventured to suggest that any fault can be found with the management or with the conduct of the plaintiff's market. The District Judge, having found all the facts, as we think rightly, in favour of the plaintiff, dismissed his suit on a construction of the last rule to which we have referred, and which, he held, applied in this case.

We have got to consider, first, what is the true construction of cl. (c) of s. 55 of Act No. XV of 1883. It is contended upon behalf of the Municipal Board that that section enables them to make a rule which they can put in force against new markets or old markets, whether they are well conducted and unexceptionable or the reverse, and that they can do this with the prime object of promoting the revenue of the Municipal market at the expense of the rate-payer or rate-payers of Cawnpore whose market is to be confiscated. In our opinion, although the clause is ambiguously worded, it never could have been the intention of the Legislature to give power to a Municipal Board to make a rule which would enable them to confiscate private rights in markets where the holding of the market and the maintenance of the market could not be objected to upon any public ground, and to do this without making any compensation to the person whose rights are affected. We find that in Act No. XV of 1883, when the Legislature did intend to give to Municipal Boards the power to acquire private property, they put them under the obligation of complying with the Land Acquisition Act, that is, if the Board desired to obtain the land of a private person, they had to pay just compensation for the rights which they were taking for themselves; but it is contended that, if the Board had a right to close any market in Cawnpore, although the market may be absolutely unobjectionable on the ground of public health or convenience, there was no obligation imposed by this Act on the Board to pay one anna of [323] compensation. It is quite obvious from the conduct of the Board in this case that it would not be advisable for the man whose rights were confiscated to trust himself to the tender mercies of the Board or to their conceptions of justice.

There is another reason against our construing this clause as the Board contends we should, and it is this. We do not believe it possible that the Legislature could have intended to give a power to the Board by the exercise of which they might confiscate private rights for the purpose of increasing their own revenues; and that in truth is what the Board has been trying to do with regard to the plaintiff and his market. The Legislature could not have intended that a Municipal Board should, of its own free will, and at its own indiscretion, have a right to treat that as a nuisance which by no possible view could be regarded by the public or by a lawyer as a nuisance. As we read the clause it was meant to give to Municipal Boards power to make rules for prohibiting the establishment of markets, that is, to prevent new markets being established, and to give them power to control the maintenance of existing markets or of markets which might be established with their sanction. By "maintenance" we presume was intended the keeping up of a market in such a manner as would make it a fit place for the carrying on of a market having regard both to public health and public convenience. It also gave them the power to make rules for the management of such markets. But until the Legislature tell us that it was their intention to confer upon Municipal Boards power to confiscate private rights, the maintenance of which is entirely unobjectionable on public grounds, and to do so without paying any compensation, we must construe clause (c) in such a manner as not to cast the slur upon the Legislature of having worked a gross injustice, and we do so construe it.

We allow this appeal, with costs and in this Court and in the Courts below; and we decree the plaintiff's suit and make the declaration which he has asked for.

Appeal decreed.

(1897) 72.Pre-emption—Wajibularz—Hindu widow in possession of property of her deceased husband but not as his heir—Stranger—Effect of joining a stranger as plaintiff in a suit for pre-emption.

A Hindu widow in possession of the immoveable property of her deceased husband, but not as his heir, there being a son living, has no right of pre-emption as a co-sharer by virtue of such possession, even though she may be recorded as a co-sharer in the village papers. Phopi Ram v. Rukmin Kuar (1) and Imam ud-din v. Surjaiti (2) followed.

Where a plaintiff having a right to pre-empt joins with himself in a suit for pre-emption a stranger, i. e., a person who has no such right, he thereby forfeits his right to pre-empt, and this disability cannot be overcome by amending the plaint by striking out the name of the stranger. Bhawani Prasad v. Domru (3), Ram Nath v. Badri Narain (4) and Fida Ali v. Muzaffar Ali (5) referred to.

THE suit out of which this appeal arose was a suit for pre-emption on the basis of the wajib-ul-arz. The property in suit was ten hiswa share in the village, forming a separate patti belonging to Shibraj Singh and Bahadur Singh. They sold their share under a sale deed dated the 18th of August and registered on the 7th of September 1893 to Kunwar Misr Harcharan Lal; and he in turn sold it to one Bhupal Singh on the 22nd of July 1894. The plaintiffs were for the most part sharers in the other patti in the village, and as such entitled under the wajib-ul-arz to pre-emption as against Kunwar Misr Harcharan Lal who was a stranger; but they joined with themselves in the suit two widows, Musammam Indar Kunwar and Musammam Gaura, who, though recorded in the village papers as co-sharers, were only so recorded by courtesy, being widows of deceased co-sharers whose sons were living. The subsequent vendee, Bhupal Singh, was made a party to the suit, under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and he raised the plea that the female plaintiffs, being in fact not [325] co-sharers in the village, had no right of pre-emption, and further, that the other plaintiffs who were co-sharers, by joining with them in their suit these two strangers, had forfeited their own right of pre-emption.

The Court of first instance found that the two widows were not strangers, inasmuch as their names were recorded in the khewat of the village, and also apparently because they would be entitled to get a share on partition. In other respects the Court found in favour of the plaintiff and gave them a decree for $\frac{1}{3}$ of the share claimed, having regard to the fact that Bhupal Singh was a pre-emptor of equal rights with themselves.

From this decree Bhupal Singh appealed to the High Court, raising the same plea as to the effect of the joinder of the two widows as plaintiffs as he had raised in the suit.

APPEL-

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.:—This was a suit for pre-emption, on the basis of the wajib-ul-arz. The property in suit belonged to Shibraj Singh and Babadur Singh, and was sold by them on the 18th of August, 1893, to Kunwar Misr Harcharan, a stranger to the village. The latter sold the property on the 22nd of July, 1894, to Bhupal, the appellant, who is a co-sharer of the original vendors. The plaintiffs brought the present suit to enforce their right of pre-emption in respect of the sale to Kunwar Misr Harcharan, and subsequently added Bhupal as a defendant to the suit. One of the grounds on which Bhupal contested the claim was that the female plaintiffs were not co-sharers in the village, and had not the right to pre-empt, and that the other plaintiffs by associating them with themselves in the suit had forfeited their own right of pre-emption. The Court below has granted to the plaintiffs a decree for a portion of the property after excluding the portion which in its opinion Bhupal was entitled to pre-empt. Bhupal has preferred this appeal, and he reiterates the plea raised in the Court below as to the right of the plaintiffs to maintain the suit. We have two [326] questions to decide in this appeal, first, whether the two female plaintiffs are co-sharers or strangers; and secondly, if they are strangers, what is the effect on the claim of the other plaintiffs of their being associated in the suit with those plaintiffs.

(1897) 72.

As regards the first point, it appears that the sons of both the ladies are alive, and therefore the ladies have no right as heirs to their husbands to share in their husbands' property. It is not alleged that they had acquired a share in the property by any right other than a right derived from their husbands, who were the original owners of the property, on the strength of which they claim to be co-sharers. It is true that in the revenue records, their names have been entered along with those of their sons as co-sharers in the village, but that circumstance alone would not make them co-sharers and confer on them the right of pre-emption as co-sharers, since as a matter of fact they have no right to the property as co-sharers. The Subordinate Judge has held that the ladies have a right of pre-emption, because they have a right to maintenance and also because on a partition they would get a share in their husband's estate. This view is opposed to the ruling of this Court in *Phopi Ram v. Rukmin Kuar (1) and Imam-ud-din v. Surjaiti† (2). Had these rulings been before the Subordinate Judge he would probably have arrived at a different conclusion.

We must, therefore hold that the two plaintiffs, Musammat Indar Kunwar and Musammat Gaura, were not entitled to claim pre-emption in respect of the property in suit.

As for the second question, it has been held that a co-sharer by associating with himself a stranger in a suit brought for pre-emption thereby forfeits his right of pre-emption. By the very act of joining a stranger in the suit he attempts to violate the pre-emptive right and estops himself from asserting it. This was held in Bhawani Prasad v. Damru (3) and in the recent case of Ram Nath v. Badri Narain (4) decided by a Bench of three Judges. It was contended before us that the female plaintiffs were not such strangers as would entail the dismissal of the suit of the other [327] plaintiffs, and that the defect in the suit, if any, might be remedied by an amendment of the plaint and by striking out the names of the female plaintiffs. We cannot accept either of these contentions. As held in Fida Ali v. Muzaffar Ali (1) the word "stranger" is a correlative to "pre-emptor," and is used to denote a person who has not the right of pre-emption. If these ladies, who had not the right of pre-emption by reason of their not being co-sharers in the village, were granted a decree in this case, the result would be that a share of the village would pass into the hands of the personal heirs of these ladies, who might be entire strangers to the village. As to the argument that the defect in the plaint could be remedied by an amendment, we may observe, as held in the cases above referred to, that the very fact of a person having the right of pre-emption joining with himself strangers, i.e., persons who have not a right of pre-emption, is in itself sufficient to estop him from asserting his claim. An amendment of the plaint therefore would not be of any avail to the other plaintiffs. For the above reasons we are of opinion that the suit ought to have been dismissed. We allow the appeal, and, setting aside the decree below, dismiss the suit with costs here and in the Court below. The objections under s. 561 necessarily fail and are dismissed with costs.

Appeal decreed.

* Judgment in this case was as follows :—

EDGE, C.J., and BRODRURST, J.—This appeal has arisen in a pre-emption suit. The appellants before us are the defendants to the suit. The plaintiff is the respondent. She is a Hindu lady. Her husband, Jai Singh, had two sons by her, and one son, Beni Singh, by a first wife. Beni Singh brought a suit for partition. On that the plaintiff here brought her suit claiming her share on partition and obtained a decree for a share, and on partition her share. It is in right of her interest in that share that she claims to be entitled to maintain this suit for pre-emption. It has been contended on behalf of the appellants that a Hindu widow or wife who has obtained on partition a share does not in right of that share obtain any right of pre-emption. On the other hand it is contended that a Hindu lady who obtains a share on partition stands exactly in the same position, so far as pre-emption is concerned, as does a Hindu widow who has taken by inheritance a share from her deceased husband. In support of the contention that a Hindu widow who has taken a share by inheritance from her [328] deceased husband has a right of pre-emption; we have been referred to the case of Phulman Rai v. Dani Kuari (2), to Mayne on Hindu Law and Usage, (4th edition), page 689, para. 577, and that portion of the judgment of the Calcutta High Court in Sorolah Dossee v. Bhoobun Mohun Neoghy (3) at page 307. On behalf of the appellants we have been referred to Dila Kuari v. Jagarnath Kuari; (4) Tagore Law Lectures on the Hindu Widow, 1879, page 457; Sorolah Dossee v. Bhoobun Mohun Neoghy (3), and particularly to that portion of the report at page 303; Hemangini Dasi v. Kedarnath Kundu Chowdhry (5), and particularly to that portion of the judgment at pages 765 and 766. We have also been referred to Sheo Dyal Tewari v. Jadoonath Tewari (6); Mitakshara, Chap I., s. 7, para 1, and Chap I, s. 2, verse 8; Smiriti Chandrika, Chap. IV, verse 7; West and Buhler's Hindu Law, page 303. Now it appears to us that it is admitted law that a Hindu lady, whether she be wife or widow, cannot claim partition unless and until some male member of the Hindu family entitled to partition, has claimed partition. It is also, we think, certain, in these Provinces at least, that a Hindu lady who has obtained a share on partition obtains nothing beyond a life-interest in the share. A Hindu widow is entitled to maintenance out of the family property, and it appears to us that her right to a share on partition flows from her right to maintenance and arises on the breaking up of the family property; and, so far as pre-emption is, concerned her obtaining a share on partition would give her no more right to claim pre-emption in the village than if she had been allowed to have possession of a particular share for maintenance without partition, that is, that she does not obtain, by reason of getting a share on partition, such an interest as would support a suit for pre-emption. We do not see in the case of a Hindu lady who has obtained a share on partition, anything which would give her a right to claim pre-emption, any more than what existed in Dila Kuari v. Jagarnath Kuari (1) in which case a Hindu widow had under the decree of Court been put in possession of a share in lieu of maintenance. Difficulties might arise if we were to hold that a Hindu widow in right of a share obtained by her on partition, got thereby a right of pre-emption in the village. Cases might arise in which a share obtained by pre-emption by a Hindu widow, if she had such a right, might on her death pass away into the hands of a person who was not a co-sharer, and under circumstances which would preclude any co-sharer in the village claiming pre-emption. Such a case might possibly arise if the Hindu widow paid the pre-emptive price out of her stridhan, which on her death would go to her father's heirs. We think it is better for us to follow the principle which we find in Dila Kuari v. Jagarnath Kuari (1) which will not interfere with the very object of the custom of pre-emption, namely, the exclusion of strangers from the village, rather than to follow the principle affirmed in Phulman Rai v. Dani Kuari (2) which was a case in which a lady took by [329] inheritance to her husband. We need not express any opinion as to whether that case was correctly decided or not. In our opinion the plaintiff here did not obtain in right of the share she got on partition any right of pre-emption in the village. We allow the appeal with costs and dismiss the suit with costs.

Appeal decreed.

[N.B. This note case has been followed in 19 A. 324 (326) ; 19 A. 329 N. = 15 A.W.N. (1895), 84.]

† In Imam-ud-din v. Surjaiti, the following judgment was delivered :—

EDGE, C.J., and BANERJI, J.—This appeal has arisen in a suit for pre-emption brought on a wajib-ul-arz. The first Court gave a decree, and the defendants, who were the vendees, have appealed. The facts are simple in so far as they refer to the point which decides this case. The plaintiff is the widow of one Sukh Darshan Singh. Sukh Darshan Singh and his brother, Umrao Singh, were in the possession of twenty biswas in the village. On the death of Sukh Darshan Singh, a dispute arose between Umrao Singh and the present plaintiff as to her rights, and in the end that suit was settled by an agreement of compromise, dated the 19th of March, 1887, entered into between the parties. Under that agreement the plaintiff was allowed the profits of 5 biswas of the property for her life, but the agreement specifically provided that she should have no other interest in the property and that she should have no power to transfer by way of mortgage, or sale, or will, or in any other way, any part of the property. The Subordinate Judge who tried the case, found that the brothers were separate and not joint. In our opinion it is immaterial whether Umrao Singh and Sukh Darshan Singh were joint or separate. The plaintiff's sole title now is that conferred on her by the compromise of the 19th of March, 1887. It appears to us that the effect of that compromise was to limit the interest of the plaintiff, whatever it may have been before the compromise, to the enjoyment of the profits of the 5 biswas for her life-time without any power of mortgaging or selling or transferring even her life interest. Under that agreement, the plaintiff was in the position of a Hindu widow in a joint family who is allowed the profits of a portion of the family property for her maintenance, that is, so far as any interest she took in the property is concerned. The interest which the plaintiff has under that compromise is of a totally different description and far more limited than the interest which the Hindu widow of a sonless separated husband would have in his estate on his death. In our opinion the plaintiff is not a proprietor in the mahal within the contemplation of the pre-emption clause of the waji-ul-arz. The position of Hindu widows, so far as the right of pre-emption is concerned, has been considered by this Court in Phulman Rai v. Dani Kuari (2) in Dila Kuari v. Jagarnath Kuari (1), and in Second Appeal No. 958 of 1888, decided on the 20th of May 1890, [ante p. 327].

We hold that the plaintiff in this case had no pre-emptive right, and we allow this appeal and dismiss the suit with costs in all Courts.

17 A.W.N.
(1897) 75.Amendment of plaint—Suit brought in the name of the idol of a temple—Amendment allowed to name of manager of temple—Practice.

A suit relating to property alleged to belong to a temple cannot be brought in the name of the idol of the temple.

Where such a suit was so brought, the Court in Second Appeal allowed the plaint to be amended, on certain conditions, by substituting the name of the person alleged to be the manager of the temple, but without prejudice to any question which might subsequently be raised as to such person's locus standi in the suit.[Overruled, 33 A. 735, (737) = 8 A.L.J. 817 (819) = 11 Ind. Cas. 47; Appr., 23 A.167.]

THE suit out of which this appeal arose was brought really on behalf of a temple for the recovery of certain property alleged to be due under an award. The plaint was thus entitled :—"Thakur Raghunathji Maharaj seated in the temple at Ramghat, pargana Anupshahr in the Bulandshahr district, through Salig Ram, son of Raghunath, Manager and Superintendent of the Temple." No objection was taken to this form of the plaint in the Court of first instance, and that Court (Subordinate Judge of Aligarh) gave the plaintiff a decree as claimed. On appeal by the defendant the District Judge dismissed the appeal and the suit, holding that the suit could not be brought in the name of an idol. The Judge also held that s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied, and no sanction having been obtained to its institution, the suit was on that ground also unmaintainable.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the appellant.

Mr. D. N. Banerji, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—This suit, which relates to property alleged to belong to a temple, was brought in the name of the idol of the temple—"Thakur Raghunathji Maharaj, seated in the temple at Ramghat, Pargana Anupshahr in the Bulandshahr district, through Saligram, son of Raghunath, Manager and Superintendent of the temple." The lower appellate Court [331] dismissed the suit upon two grounds—(1) that an idol cannot be a plaintiff in a suit under the Code of Civil Procedure, and (2) that s. 539 of that Code applied to this case, and the requirements of that section had not been complied with.

We do not see how s. 539 applies in this case at all. In our opinion the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that there must be a plaintiff to a suit, does not contemplate an idol being made plaintiff. Difficulties might arise in enforcing the process of the Court if an idol or a god of a temple were accepted as a plaintiff in a suit.

We are willing to allow an amendment to be made, which will be, of course, without prejudice to any rights which may have been acquired by limitation, or as to any question which may arise as to the right to sue of the person who may be substituted as plaintiff by way of amendment. We only allow the amendment conditionally, the condition being that within four months from this date the costs already incurred by the defendant in this suit be paid to him, including the costs of this appeal. When these costs have been paid to the defendant, or into Court to his credit, we permit an amendment to be made making Saligram, son of Raghunath, plaintiff in the suit. We do not decide in allowing the amendment that he is the proper plaintiff or that he has any right to sue. If the costs of the defendant up to the present time be not paid within the time limited, the appeal in this Court will stand dismissed with costs. If these costs are paid within the time limited, the amendment may be made within a fortnight from the payment of the costs, and in that case the decrees of the Courts below will be set aside and the case will be remanded to the Court of first instance for trial on the merits and on any issues which may arise owing to the amendment.

IN this case the plaintiff, Nand Kishore, sued for a decree declaring that the interest of his judgment-debtor, Ram Mohan, in certain property was liable to sale in execution of his decree dated the 25th of May 1889. On the 2nd of May 1891 Ram Mohan had transferred the property in suit by a private sale to the second defendant, Lalji Mal. At that time the property was under attachment in pursuance of the decree of the 25th of May 1889. On application being made by the decree-holder to bring the said property to sale in execution of his decree, Lalji Mal filed an objection under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That objection was allowed: hence the present suit.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Bareilly) dismissed the suit. The plaintiff appealed, and the Court of first appeal allowed the EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—Lalji Mal purchased from the judgment-debtors some immoveable property whilst it was under attachment in execution of a decree. Application was sub-[333]sequently made to bring that property to sale in execution of the decree. Lalji Mal filed an objection under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure and that objection was allowed. Thereupon Nand Kishore, the judgment-creditor, brought this suit under s. 283 of the Code to have it declared that the property purchased by Lalji Mal might be brought to sale in execution of his (Nand Kishore's) decree. The first Court dismissed the suit. The second Court, in appeal, set aside the decree of the first Court, and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order this appeal has been brought.

It is contended on behalf of the appellant, Lalji Mal, that the suit did not lie, as the order passed on his objection was an order in a matter to which s. 244 of the Code applied. On the other side it is contended that Lalji Mal was not a representative of a judgment-debtor within the meaning of s. 244, and further, that, his objection having been filed under s. 278 of the Code, s. 244 did not apply.

Convenience, which is not always a good reason for laying down a proposition of law, would suggest that a sale which was contrary to the provisions of s. 276 of the Code of Civil Procedure, should, if challenged by the decree-holder, be a matter to be adjudicated upon under s. 244. In our opinion, as the property in question was under attachment at the time the sale took place, the purchaser must be treated as a representative of the judgment-debtor; on the same principle as he would have been a representative of the judgment-debtor by reason of his purchase, if the decree had been one for sale of a particular property. The position of a purchaser of a property affected by a decree for sale was discussed by this Court in Madho Das v. Ramji Patak (1).

Now as to the other point. It has been decided by two different Benches of this Court that a person to whom s. 244 of the Code applies cannot avoid the application of that section by filing his objection to execution under s. 278. The cases [334] to which we refer are Shankar Dat Dube v. J. G. Harman and Co., (2) and Imdad Ali v. Jagan Lal (3). The plaintiff's suit was, in our opinion, barred by s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We allow this appeal with costs, and, setting aside the order of the Court below, we dismiss the appeal to the Court below with costs, and restore and affirm the decree of the Court of first instance.

Held, also that in the making of the talab-i-ishtishhad, the servants of the pre-emptor are competent witnesses. The disability in this respect imposed by the Muhammadan law is limited to minors and persons convicted of slander.

Muhammad Nasir-ud-din v. Abdul Hasan (1), followed. Habib un-nissa v. Abdul Rahim (2), referred to.

[D., 10 Ind. Cas. 143.]

IN this case the plaintiff, Muhammad Yusuf, sued for possession by right of pre-emption of a house and compound sold by Hafiz Abdul Karim to Muhammad Yunus Khan and Mahammad Isa Khan, defendants, on the 27th of June, 1893. The plaintiff based his claim on Muhammadan law, and also on the wajib-ul-arz. The defendants, vendees, pleaded that the Mahammadan law did not apply under the special circumstances of the case, and that the formalities required by that law had not been observed by the plaintiff. The other pleas taken by the defendants related to the claim so far as it might be based on the wajib-ul-arz.

[335] The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Aligarh, found on the two most material issues in the case, viz. (1) whether the plaintiff had a right of pre-emption under the Muhammadan law; and (2) whether the plaintiff had duly performed the ceremonies of talab-i-muasibat and talab-i-ishtishhad in favour of the plaintiff, and accordingly gave the plaintiff a decree.

The defendants, vendees, appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Ram Prasad and Pandit Moti Lal, for the appellants.

Pundit Sundar Lal and Maulvi Ghulam Mujtaba, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought by the respondent to enforce his right of pre-emption in respect of the sale of a house and compound, made in favour of the appellants on the 27th of June 1893. The plaintiff is the owner of an adjoining house, and he founded his claim on Muhammadan law, and also on the wajib-ul-arz. The defence of the defendants, vendees, was that the plaintiff had refused to purchase the property, that he did not perform the preliminary demands required by the Muhammadan law, and that he was not entitled to pre-empt the property. The Court below has found in favour of the plaintiff and granted him a decree.

The first contention raised before us in appeal is that the plaintiff acquiesced in the sale, and thereby forfeited his right of pre-emption. In our opinion, there is no evidence to support this contention. The only evidence to which our attention has been drawn is the deposition of Mr. Shapurji. He states that before the purchase by the defendants he had a conversation with the plaintiff about the purchase of the property in question, and that the plaintiff told him that he did not care to purchase the property. There is nothing to show that after the terms of the sale had been settled with the appellants, and the sale to them had been arranged, the plaintiff was asked if he would purchase the property on the same terms and declined to make the purchase. On the contrary we find that on the 8th of October, 1892 he wrote to the vendor expressing his willingness to purchase the [336] property and in fact asking him to convey it to him. That letter clearly shows that the plaintiff was insisting on his right of pre-emption, and there is nothing to prove that subsequently to the date of that letter he changed his mind.

Mr. Moti Lal on behalf of the appellants next contends that, as it appears from the deposition of the plaintiff himself that after the purchase by the defendants-vendees he, the plaintiff, expressed his willingness to purchase the property from them, this circumstance was enough to extinguish the right of pre-emption of the plaintiff. In support of his contention he referred us to the case of Habib-un-nissa v. Abdul Rahim (1). The same question was considered by another Bench of this Court in a later case, viz., Muhammad Nasir-ud-din v. Abdul Hasan (2). In that case it was held, that "where a pre-emptor continues to assert his pre-emptive right, and on the strength of that right, and in his character of pre-emptor offers to take the property from the purchaser by paying him the sale price, without resorting to, and with a view to avoid litigation, he cannot be said to have acquiesced in the sale and waived his right of pre-emption." With the latter ruling, we agree. As in this case the plaintiff offered to purchase the property from the vendees whilst insisting on his right as pre-emptor, he did not by that offer forego his right of pre-emption.

The next contention on behalf of the appellants is that the respondent failed to prove that he had complied with the preliminary requirements of the Muhammadan law. With reference to this contention, we may observe that the respondent is a lawyer and a Muhammadan: it may therefore be presumed that in asserting his right of pre-emption he would do all that was required by Muhammadan law. We have in this case the evidence of the plaintiff himself that as soon as he heard of the sale in question he made the first demand, that is, the talab-i-muasibat, and that he then proceeded to the spot where the property is situated, and there, in the presence of two witnesses who had also been present [337] at the time of making the first demand, made the invocation in the presence of witnesses called talab-i-ishtishhad. It has been urged that the talab-i-ishtishhad was not performed in compliance with the Muhammadan law, inasmuch as it was made in the presence of persons who were the servants of the plaintiff, and who, it is said, were on that account not competent witnesses according to that law. We may observe that the disability as competent witnesses under the Muhammadan law is limited to minors and persons convicted of slander and does not extend to servants. There is therefore no basis for the contention that the servants of the plaintiff, in whose presence the tala'-'i-ishtishhad was performed, were not competent witnesses. Further, it is laid down in Baillie's Muhammadan law, at p. 489, that "invocation of witnesses is not required to give validity to that demand, but only in order that the pre-emptor may be provided with proof, in case the purchaser should deny the demand." That being the object of the invocation of witnesses, any persons who under the law as now administered would be competent witnesses can attest the fact of the demand with invocation being made.

(1) 8 A. 275 ; also appearing as Habib-un-nissa v. Barkat Ali.

(2) 16 A. 300.

These being the only pleas pressed before us, this appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—This appeal arises in the execution of a decree. The decree was passed on the 25th of January, 1878. On the 9th of January, 1879, the first application was made for execution. On the 19th of March, 1880, the second application was made. On the 8th of June, 1880, the third application was made. After the last-mentioned application had been made, one Sheo Dial filed an objection to the execution of the decree against this property. His objection was filed under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The objection was allowed. The allowance of that objection had the effect of determining any attachment or any order for sale which had previously been made. The decree-holder brought his suit under section 283 of the Code to have his right declared to execute his decree against this property. In that suit, he ultimately succeeded, but the decree establishing his right did not reinstate the attachment or any order for sale, if any, which may have been made. The decree-holder having by his suit established his right to execute his decree against this property, it was for him to take the necessary steps to put his decree in execution. On the 21st of August, 1886, he filed an application for the execution of his decree. Before the 21st of August, 1886, the judgment-debtor had died. The decree-holder appears to have assumed that he had a decree in rem which he could proceed to execute without bringing upon the record or giving notice to any representative of the deceased judgment-debtor. On the 4th of December, 1887, he filed another application, still without anyone to represent the estate of the deceased judgment-debtor. On the 23rd of July, 1889, he filed his sixth and last application. On the 21st of December, 1888, he had obtained an order for attachment, there being at that time no respondent to his application representing the estate or the interest which had been in the deceased judgment-debtor.

[339] It appears to us that this was a case to which s. 234 and s. 248 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied, and that the proceedings in execution after the death of the judgment-debtor made in the absence of and without notice to the representative of the judgment-debtor were ineffectual proceedings. The Subordinate Judge in the present case has held that the present application for execution is barred by limitation, and he has so held having come to the conclusion that the applications which were made when there was no representative of the deceased judgment-debtor on the record were ineffectual. On behalf of the decree-holder appellant the decision of the Full Bench in Sheo Prasad v. Hira Lal (1) was relied upon. That case is not in point. In that case in the life-time of the judgment-debtor a valid attachment had been made, which continued after his death, and an order for sale had been made, and nothing remained but to carry into effect that order for sale. The decree-holder has only himself or his advisers to thank for the position in which he finds himself. There is quite sufficient irregularity in the execution of decrees in this country without our introducing the novel system that a decree can be executed against the estate of a deceased judgment debtor without any notice to his representative and without anyone to protect the property being brought upon the record.

We dismiss this appeal with costs.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—This is an appeal from an order passed by the Judge of Saharanpur on a reference made to him on the 16th of February, 1894, by the Superintendent of the Dun. The reference was made under s. 15 of Act No. X of 1870, as Act No. I of 1894 did not come into force till the 1st of March, 1894. The Collector (Superintendent) described the land proposed to be taken up as being land situated in Kinlock's State Crown Brewery, Jharipani, consisting of 17 acres, 6 poles. He described the Crown Brewery as being the "persons interested" in the land, and stated that he had offered 476 Rupees as compensation for that land, standing trees, &c., to this he added 15 per cent. for forcible acquisition, the total amount offered being Rs. 616-7-8, a sum which he says the manager of the Brewery refused as being insufficient.

In the reference the Superintendent of Dehra Dun alludes to a claim made by the Brewery as to a spring of water and for compensation for the same, but he adds that the spring clearly belongs to Government. He did not propose to take it up under the Act.

The case first came on for hearing before the District Judge on the 20th of April, 1894, when three issues were fixed, namely:—

1. The value of the land, trees, &c.?

This was a perfectly proper issue and the only one that arose in the case.

The next two issues were:—

2. The right to the water, i.e., could the claimants claim a right to it against Government?

3. If so, the value of the water right?

These two issues did not arise on the reference and were improperly fixed for trial by the Judge as issues in the case.

[341] The evidence of one witness, Mr. Campbell, was taken and the case was adjourned to the 28th of January 1895. Before that date arrived Mr. Winter, who had succeeded Mr. Tweedie as Superintendent of the Dun, addressed to the Judge a letter, dated the 9th of November 1894, (No. 25 on the record) appended to which, with reference to his predecessor's reference of the 16th of February 1894, he submitted what he called "a further note on the subject" together with copies of certain documents. The "note" is referred to in the Judge's memorandum of the 28th January 1895 as a "long written statement" filed by the Collector. We have no hesitation in saying that the Collector was wrong in addressing such a communication to the Judge, and the Judge was equally wrong in receiving and filing it. When the appeal was being argued, Mr. Chamier, who appeared for the Government, very rightly admitted that such proceedings should never have taken place and did not attempt to support them.

In his decision the learned District Judge found, firstly, that the Brewery had no title to the land, and, secondly, that the Brewery had no title to the spring and the water. But, as the Collector had offered Rs. 616-7-8, he confirmed that award. Thus it will be seen that he did not decide the issue as to the value of the land which had been raised at the first hearing, which, as we have pointed out, was the only real issue in the case. The Crown Brewery has appealed.

It is contended that the Judge was wrong in entering into the question of the title of the Crown Brewery to the land as against the Government. In our opinion the contention is a sound one and must be supported. We fully concur in the rule of law laid down in the case of Imdad Ali Khan v. The Collector of Farakhabad (1) in which it was held:—"The Collector has no power to make a reference to the District Judge under s. 15 in cases in which he claims the land in question on behalf of Government or the Municipality, and denies the title of other claimants, and the District Judge has no jurisdiction to entertain or determine [342] such reference." If Mr. Winter desired to deny the title of the Crown Brewery to the land, &c., proposed to be taken up, his proper course, we conceive, would have been to withdraw the reference, but his not having done so did not in our opinion give the District Judge jurisdiction to decide the question of title. It therefore follows that whatever the Judge has decided in his judgment as to the title of the Brewery to the land is irrelevant and not called for by the reference. As to the spring and water, we have pointed out that the Collector did not propose to take them up under the Act; no question respecting them was before the Judge, and his finding on this point also is equally irrelevant and without jurisdiction.

There was one point and one point only awaiting decision, namely, the value of the land. On this point no decision has been given: it must now be decided. We set aside the order of the Court below and refer, under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that point for the determination of the Judge, namely, what is the value of the 17 acres 6 poles of the land together with the trees standing thereon, which the Collector proposes to take up, and what amount of compensation should be given under the Act? As both parties have had full opportunity of giving evidence, no further evidence will be taken. The Judge will send a reply to this reference in two months. On its return ten days will be allowed for objections by either party and the appeal then put up for hearing.

(Plaintiff).^{*} [17th March, 1897.]

Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), ss. 5 and 12, sch. ii, art. 152—Appeal—Limitation — Exclusion of time necessary for obtaining copies of decree and judgment.

If the period prescribed by the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, for the presentation of an appeal expires on a day on which the [343] Court is closed, and if the appellant has not obtained copies of the decree and judgment before the closing of the Court and applies for such copies on the date of the re-opening of the Court, whilst his right of appeal is still alive, he is entitled to the benefit of the time requisite for obtaining the copies, and if his appeal be presented before the expiry of that time it is not barred by limitation.

A decree was passed against a defendant by the Court of a Munsif on the 17th of September 1894. The appellate Court (Subordinate Judge's Court) was closed from the 6th of October to the 4th of November both days inclusive. On the 5th of November, the defendant-appellant applied for copies of the decree and judgment. The copies were delivered to her on the 6th November, and on the same day she presented her appeal to the appellate Court. Held that the appeal was within time.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The only question to be determined in this second appeal is whether the appeal preferred to the lower appellate Court by the present appellant was or was not barred by the law of limitation. In order to understand that question it is necessary to state a few dates. The decree of the Court of first instance was made on the 17th of September, 1894. The Courts were closed for the Dasehra vacation from the 6th of October to the 4th of November, 1894, both days inclusive. On the 5th of November, 1894, the day on which the Courts re-opened, the appellant applied for copies of the decree and judgment. The copies were delivered to her on the 6th of November, 1894. On that date she presented her appeal. There can be no doubt that the period of thirty days prescribed by art. 152 of sch. II of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, had expired on that date; but it was contended on behalf of the appellant that, as the thirty days had expired on the 17th of October, 1894, when the Court was closed, she was entitled under the first paragraph of section 5 to present her appeal on the date of the re-opening of the Court; that on that date she applied for copies of the decree and judgment, and that, as the copies were not delivered [344] on that date, the time requisite for obtaining the copies should have been excluded from computation under s. 12, and therefore her appeal was in time on the 6th of November, 1894.

This contention, which was overruled by the Court below, has been reiterated in this appeal, and we are of opinion that it must prevail. It is beyond doubt that, had the copies applied for on the 5th of November, 1894, been prepared and delivered on that date, and had the appeal been presented on that date, it would have been within time. It is equally beyond doubt, and has indeed been conceded, that had the thirtieth day from the date of the decree been the 5th November, 1894, the appellant would have been entitled to exclude the time requisite for obtaining copies of the decree and judgment, that is, to add the number of days occupied in the preparation of the copies to the thirty days prescribed by art. 152. In that case the appeal preferred on the 6th of November, 1894, would undoubtedly have been in time. We have to consider whether it was contemplated by the Legislature that a different rule as to the computation of limitation would apply if the last day of the period of limitation prescribed in the second schedule expired on a day when the Court was closed. It is conceivable, and indeed it not unfrequently happens, that a judgment is delivered at a late hour on the day preceding a vacation extending over a longer period than thirty days, and it becomes impossible for the party against whom judgment is given to apply for copies of the decree and judgment on that day. Section 541 of the Code of Civil Procedure requires that a memorandum of appeal should be accompanied by a copy of the decree appealed against and, unless the Court dispenses with it, by a copy of the judgment also; and it has been held in this Court that a petition of appeal unaccompanied by such copies is not a valid petition. If therefore the contention be correct that an application for copies of the decree and judgment made on the day of the re-opening of the Court after a long vacation lasting over a period exceeding thirty days is beyond time, and that the time requisite for obtaining the copies cannot for that reason be excluded under s. 12 of [345] the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, the result would be that the defeated suitor would under such circumstances be deprived of his right of appeal. Unless the copies which he was bound to produce with his memorandum of appeal were applied for, prepared and delivered to him on the date of the re-opening of the Court, he could not present a valid appeal on that date by reason of his not having obtained and not having had the opportunity of obtaining the copies before that date; and if the copies were not prepared and delivered on that very date, he was not entitled, according to the respondent's contention, to have the benefit of the time occupied in the preparation of the copies. There would thus be a denial to him of the right of appeal which he would otherwise have under the law. We cannot conceive that the law contemplates such an anomalous state of things, and we do not consider we should be justified in holding that it does, unless compelled to do so by clear and unambiguous provisions contained in the Indian Limitation Act. In our opinion the Act does not contain such provisions. Mr. Sundar Lal for the respondent urged that the question before us was concluded by the ruling of the Full Bench in Bechi v. Ahsan-ul-lah Khan (1), and he pressed on us a passage in the judgment of Mr. Justice Mahmood at pp. 471 and 472 of the report. With reference to that ruling we may observe in the first place that the question which we have to decide in this appeal did not arise in that case and therefore any remarks which may have been made in the judgment on that question were obiter. In the next place, the learned Judges did not in that case hold that an appeal presented under circumstances similar to those of the present appeal would be time-barred. The observations of Mr. Justice Mahmood to which our attention has been called had reference to a contention raised in that case that a vacation preceding the date of the application for a copy of the decree should be regarded as time requisite for obtaining the copy. We fully agree with Mr. Justice Mahmood that no period of time can be regarded as time requisite for obtaining a copy which [346] is not subsequent to the presentation of the application for a copy. That, however, is not the question which arises in this case. There can be no doubt that, if the time within which an appeal may under the law of limitation be presented is allowed to expire and the decree to become final, the subsequent presentation of an application for copies of the decree and judgment cannot entitle the appellant to prefer an appeal by excluding from computation the time requisite for obtaining the copies. But what we have to consider is whether an application for copies made on the date of the re-opening of the Court is within time. Section 4 of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, provides that 'subject to the provisions contained in ss. 5 to 25 (inclusive), every suit instituted, appeal presented and application made after the period of limitation prescribed therefor by the second schedule hereto annexed shall be dismissed.' Article 152 of the second schedule should therefore be read subject to the provisions of ss. 5 and 12. By the first paragraph of s. 5, if the period of limitation prescribed for an appeal expires on a day when the Court is closed, the appeal may be presented on the day that the Court re-opens. An application for copies of the decree and judgment presented on that day would therefore be an application made before the expiry of the time allowed for the presentation of the appeal, and under s. 12 the appellant would be entitled to the benefit of the time requisite for the obtaining of the copies. It was argued by Mr. Sundar Lal that, if this view were correct, an appellant who had obtained the necessary copies before the commencement of the vacation would still be entitled to exclude from computation the period requisite for obtaining the copies, and would thus enjoy the benefit of a longer period of limitation than that to which other appellants would be entitled. This argument, though ingenious, is in our opinion fallacious. Section 12, it is true, lays down a rule of exclusion, but it is in reality a rule enabling a certain period, namely, that occupied in the preparation of copies of the decree and judgment, to be added to the period prescribed by the second schedule and to be taken [347] into account in computing the period of limitation. If the copies were obtained before the commencement of the vacation, the time requisite for obtaining the copies is known, and if that period of time which is already known and the period prescribed by the schedule, both added together, expired on a day on which the Court was closed, s. 5 would enable the appellant to present his appeal only on the day of the re-opening of the Court and not on a later date. We are accordingly of opinion that if the period prescribed by the second schedule for the presentation of an appeal expires on a day on which the Court is closed, and if the appellant has not obtained copies of the decree and judgment before the closing of the Court and applies for such copies on the date of the re-opening of the Court, whilst his right of appeal is still alive, he is entitled to the benefit of the time requisite for obtaining the copies, and if his appeal be presented before the expiry of that time, it is not barred by limitation. If, however, the copies were obtained before the closing of the Court, and the time requisite for obtaining the copies and the period of limitation prescribed by the second schedule added together expired on a day on which the Court was closed, the appeal will not be in time unless presented on the day that the Court re-opens. A similar view appears to have been held by the Punjab Chief Court in Chatar Singh v. The Empress, quoted in Rivaz's Edition of the Indian Limitation Act, 4th edition, p. 40.

For the above reasons we hold that the appeal presented by the appellant in the Court below on the 6th of November, 1894, was not beyond time, and that the lower appellate Court has erred in dismissing the appeal as time barred.

We allow this appeal, and, setting aside the decree below, remand the case to the lower appellate Court under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for trial according to law. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J.—The plaintiff had obtained a decree for money. The decretal amount was below Rs. 1,000. He sought to execute his decree by selling certain houses. One of the defendants to the suit filed objections under s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the execution of the decree against the houses. These objections were allowed, and thereupon the plaintiff brought this suit to establish his right to bring the property to sale. The value of the property sought to be sold exceeded Rs. 1,000, and was in fact about Rs. 1,200. The plaintiff bona fide believing that, having regard to the value of the property, his suit was not within the jurisdiction of the Munsif, brought his suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Allahabad. Subsequently the Subordinate Judge held that the suit should have been valued with reference to the amount of the decree sought to be executed and not with [349] reference to the value of the property sought to be sold. He decided he had not jurisdiction to try the suit and returned the plaint to the plaintiff to be presented to the proper Court. On the same day on which the plaint was returned the plaintiff presented his plaint to the Court of the Munsif, but at that time more than twelve months had expired since the date of the order allowing the objection to execution. The Munsif has held that the suit was barred by time. The District Judge in appeal considered he was bound to apply a ruling of this Court according to which a litigant proceeding on an error of law could not be held to be proceeding in good faith. The judgment to which I refer is that of Ramjiwan Mal v. Chand Mal (1). The section of the Limitation Act there specifically in question was s. 5, and one of the Judges expressed an opinion that no honest mistake in law could bring a person within the terms of s. 14 or s. 5. He came to that conclusion by applying the legal maxim—Ignorantia legis neminem excusat—to a civil case. In my opinion the application of this maxim to the question before him was too wide. Of course no one can be allowed to plead that, in a common assault on another, he was acting in ignorance of the fact that the act was an unlawful one, nor could a defendant in a suit be heard to plead as a defence in an action for damage for breach of contract, that he believed in law he was justified in breaking his contract, if the law did not in fact afford such justification. There can be no doubt that in this case the plaintiff was prosecuting his suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge in good faith. We need not decide whether or not the suit should have been filed originally in the Court of the Munsif. The mistake, if there was one, arose through ignorance of the law and will not exclude the plaintiff from the indulgence of s. 14 of Act No. XV of 1877. That a mistake of law can be made in good faith most Judges would probably admit from their own personal experiences on the Bench. We have not been referred to any case in which the point directly in issue (and which was decided) was whether a person who had [350] prosecuted a civil proceeding in good faith in a Court which from a defect of jurisdiction or from some other cause of a like nature, was unable to entertain it, was excluded from the protection of s. 14 of Act No. XV of 1877, if the prosecution of such a civil proceeding in such a Court arose through his having made a mistake in law as to the Court which had jurisdiction to entertain the proceeding.

We were referred to several cases in which the question as to what was sufficient cause under s. 5 of the same Act arose. In the case of Sita Ram Paraji v. Nimba (2) the Bombay Court held that ignorance of the law cannot be recognized as a sufficient reason for delay under s. 5 of Act No. XV of 1877. In my opinion that proposition, which is really the proposition of the head note, went too far. No doubt, if a litigant alleged that he had never heard of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877, his ignorance of the existence of such an Act would not be a sufficient cause under s. 5.

In Huro Chunder Roy v. Surnamoyi (1) the learned Judges decided, with regard to s. 5, as to what is sufficient cause, that it is for the Judge in each case to exercise his discretion having regard to the particular facts established before him, and they declined to hold that a bona fide mistake as to the period of limitation could not in any circumstances be a valid ground for the admission of an appeal under s. 5.

In Krishna v. Chathappan (2) the learned Judges said in reference to s. 5:—"We are not prepared to hold that a mistake of law is in no circumstances a sufficient cause within the meaning of that section," and later on (p. 271):—"The true rule is whether under the special circumstances of each case the appellant acted under an honest, though mistaken, belief formed with due care and attention. Section 14 of the Limitation Act indicates that the legislature intended to show indulgence to a party acting bona fide under a mistake. We think that s. 5 gives the Courts a discretion which in respect of jurisdiction is [351] to be exercised in the way in which judicial power and discretion ought to be exercised upon principles which are well understood; the words 'sufficient cause' receiving a liberal construction so as to advance substantial justice when no negligence nor inaction nor want of bona fides is imputable to the appellant." I agree with this view, understanding that by "imputable to" the learned Judges meant "established against." I myself am conscious of having made many mistakes of law, and in my opinion s. 14 is applicable to such a case as this.

I would allow the appeal, and, setting aside the judgment of the Court below, would remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of first instance so that the suit may be decided on its merits. I would make the order with costs to the plaintiff in this Court and in the lower appellate Court.

BLAIR, J.—I acquiesce in the proposed order. I can gather nothing from the phraseology of s. 14 to justify the drawing of a distinction between a bona fide mistake of fact and a bona fide mistake of law. The case upon the authority of which the Court below decided is Ramjiwan Mal v. Chand Mal (3). There in the judgment of one of the Judges I find broadly laid down a distinction which I am unable to draw. It is true that one Judge in his judgment took care to base his decision on a general consideration of the facts of the case, which included inexplicable delay on the part of the litigant. As, however, that case may well be misleading to litigants and their advisers, I am desirous of emphasizing my dissent from this proposition which it may well be supposed that case decided, viz.:—that an error in law does not fall within the scope of s. 14.

BANERJI, J.—I am of the same opinion as the learned Chief Justice.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur with the learned Chief Justice in thinking this appeal should be allowed and in the order proposed by him.

[352] In my opinion the judgment in Ramjiwan Mal v. Chand Mal (3) imposes a restriction on the application of s. 14 of the Limitation Act which was not contemplated by the legislature. It is perfectly conceivable that there may be a bona fide mistake as to the proper Court in which

(1) 13 C. 266.

(2) 13 M. 269.

(3) 10 A. 587.

a suit should be instituted. The Judges of this Court know for instance how difficult it is to define the boundary line which separates the jurisdiction of the civil Courts from the jurisdiction of the Courts of revenue. Had the legislature intended to put on s. 14 of the Limitation Act the narrow interpretation which has been placed upon it in the ruling referred to above, I should have expected to find inserted in it, or in the last clause of s. 3 of the Act, a proviso to the effect that nothing should be deemed to have been done in good faith which is done by reason of a mistake of law and not by reason of a mistake of fact.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court will be in terms of the order proposed by the Chief Justice.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Mr. Justice Banerji.

THE MAHARAJA OF BENARES, (Plaintiff) v. DALJIT SINGH
AND OTHERS (Defendants).^{*} [30th March, 1897.]

Land-holder and tenant—Suit to recover arrears of rent from representatives of deceased tenant at fixed rates—Liability of representatives.

Held that the legal representatives of a deceased tenant at fixed rates who had died leaving the rent payable by him in arrears were liable for payment of such arrears to the extent of the assets of the tenant which had come into their hands, and that this liability was not affected by the question whether or not they took over the tenancy of the deceased themselves. Lekhraj Singh v. Rai Singh (1) referred to.

THE facts of this case are as follows :—

One Thakur Dayal Singh was a tenant at fixed rates under the plaintiff-appellant, the Maharaja of Benares. Thakur Dayal [353] Singh's tenure was sold by auction, and his tenancy rights were purchased by the Maharaja on the 20th of April 1892. Subsequently, in March 1893, Thakur Dayal Singh died. On the 14th of January 1895 the Maharaja sued Supher Singh and Makhan Singh, the sons and heirs of Thakur Dayal Singh, for the arrears of rents of the fixed rate holding for 1299 Fasli.

The first Court dismissed the suit, holding that the heirs of Thakur Dayal Singh were not liable for the arrears of rent due by their father.

The plaintiff appealed, and the lower appellate Court (District Judge of Benares) dismissed the appeal. The District Judge based his decision on his interpretation of the Full Bench ruling of the High Court in Lekhraj Singh v. Rai Singh (1), and held that, inasmuch as the tenancy had not been taken over by the sons of Thakur Dayal Singh, neither were they liable to pay arrears of rent due by him.

The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the High Court.

BANERJI, J.—This appeal must prevail, and the learned vakil for the respondent has frankly conceded that he cannot support the judgment of the lower appellate Court. The facts which gave rise to the suit were these. One Thakur Dayal Singh was a tenant at fixed rates of the plaintiff appellant. His rights as such were sold by auction, and purchased by the plaintiff in 1892. Thakur Dayal was in arrears for the period prior to the date of the auction sale. He died in 1893 leaving those arrears unpaid; thereupon the present suit was brought against his sons as his legal representatives for recovery of the arrears. The Courts below have dismissed the suit as against the legal representatives of Thakur Dayal Singh, and the learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has based his judgment on what he conceived to be the result of the Ruling of the Full Bench in Lekhraj Singh v. Rai Singh (1). He thinks that [354] since the tenancy did not devolve on the defendants, they were not liable in any capacity for the arrears due by their father Thakur Dayal Singh. This view is clearly erroneous, and is not borne out by the ruling of the Full Bench referred to by the learned Judge. The question which arose in that case was whether a suit for arrears of rent due by a deceased tenant brought against the legal representatives of that tenant, who had succeeded him in his holding was cognizable by the Revenue Court or the Civil Court. It was held by the majority of the Judges constituting the Full Bench, that such a suit was cognizable by a Court of Revenue. It was not held in that case, that if the legal representative of the deceased tenant did not choose to take possession of the holding he would not be liable for the arrears due by the deceased tenant, although he might be in possession of the assets of the deceased. It is impossible that such a view could be entertained by the Full Bench. It may happen that a tenant, who has died leaving his rent in arrear, has left assets of large value which have passed to his legal representative. Surely it cannot be said that if the legal representative did not elect to take the holding of the deceased, he would not be liable for the arrears, although he might have taken possession of the assets of the deceased. In the judgment on which the learned Judge has relied it was observed by the learned Chief Justice that "the person upon whom the right of occupancy devolves is not bound to accept the tenancy, but, if he does accept it, he, in my opinion, must accept it subject to its burdens, and one of those burdens is the legal liability to pay the rent which is in arrear and a suit for which is not barred by limitation. If such a person elects not to accept the right of occupancy, his liability would be limited to that of a legal representative to whom assets had come." The learned Judge was therefore in error in thinking that the mere fact of the holding of Thakur Dayal Singh not being in the possession of the defendants relieved them of liability to pay the rent due by Thakur Dayal Singh. They as legal representatives of Thakur Dayal Singh would be liable to the extent of the assets which have come [355] into their hands. It was not asserted on behalf of the defendants that they had not received any assets. It was admitted, as is indeed the fact, that they were the legal representatives of Thakur Dayal Singh. The existence of the arrears is also not denied. The plaintiff was therefore entitled to a decree against the defendants, their liability being limited to the extent of the assets of Thakur Dayal which have come into their hands. I make such a decree in favour of the appellant, and vary the decree of the lower appellate Court to that extent with costs here and in the Courts below.

BHAGWAN DAI AND ANOTHER (Opposite Parties) v. HIRA
(Applicant).^{*} [8th April, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 108, 157 - Order setting aside ex parte decree - Appeal.

No appeal will lie from an order made under s. 157 read with s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure setting aside a decree passed ex parte in default of appearance of the defendant on a day to which the hearing of the suit had been adjourned. Jonardan Dobey v. Ramdhone Singh (1) referred to.

[R., 20 A. 195.]

MUSAMMAT Bhagwan Dai and another brought a suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut against one Hira, a minor under the guardianship of his mother, Musammat Lado. The case was partly heard, when, on a day to which the hearing of the suit had been adjourned, the defendant's pleader did not appear, and the Court proceeded with the case and made a decree ex parte in favour of the plaintiffs. Thereupon the defendant presented to the Court an application purporting to be an application under s. 623 of the Code of Civil Procedure for review of judgment, the application being mainly based on the allegation that the defendant's pleader was ill and unable to appear at the [356] time when the ex parte decree was passed, and that the defendant's guardian was not aware of that fact and therefore had made no arrangement to retain another pleader. The Subordinate Judge, characterizing the application as one, under s. 108 of the Code, accepted the applicant's plea, and, setting aside his ex parte decree, appointed a fresh date for proceeding with the suit. From this order the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

Maulvi Ghulam Mujtaba, for the appellants.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—The Subordinate Judge proceeded ex parte and made a decree. His procedure really was under s. 157 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An application was made to him under s. 108 of the Code to set aside the decree on the ground that there was "sufficient cause" which prevented the defendant from appearing when the suit was called on for hearing after an adjournment. The Subordinate Judge set aside the decree in compliance with the application. This appeal has been brought from that order. The appellants contend that s. 108 did not apply, and that the defendant's remedy (if any)

When a Court acts under s. 157 of the Code it has to apply the procedure of Chapter VII. Part of the procedure pertinent to such a case is the procedure of s. 108. In our opinion s. 108 applied, and, as no appeal is given from an order allowing an application under s. 108, this appeal does not lie. We are supported in this view by a decision of the Full Bench of the Calcutta Court in Jonardan Dobey v. Ramdhone Singh (1). We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Before Mr. Justice Knox and Mr. Justice Burkitt.

HANUMAN PRASAD SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. BHAGAUTI PRASAD AND OTHERS (Defendants).^{*} [10th April, 1897.]

Limitation—Act No. XIV of 1859, s. 1—Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, art. 141—Suit by reversioner to recover possession of immoveable property alienated by intermediate female heir—Hindu Law.

A female heir in possession of immoveable property for her life can without legal necessity make a valid alienation of her life estate, but the possession of the alienee will not under ordinary circumstances be adverse to the reversioner, whose cause of action for possession of the said property will not accrue until the death of the female heir, or of the last of such heirs if more than one.

One Paltan Singh, a separated Hindu, died about 1822 leaving two widows, Harnam Kunwari and Asman Kunwari, and three daughters, Rachpali, Jairaji, and Dilraji. The widows took possession of the immoveable property of Paltan Singh, and some time before 1857 Harnam Kunwari the survivor of them sold a certain village to one Harnam Pathak. Harnam Kunwari died in 1857. The three daughters next succeeded to the estate of Paltan Singh, and the last of them died in 1890 without having made any attempt to interfere with the possession of the alienee. In 1894 the two sons of Rachpali sued for possession of the property which had been sold by Harnam Kunwari.

Held that the suit was within time.

Per BURKITT, J.—Decrees affecting immoveable property obtained against a female heir in respect of the subject matter of the inheritance (if obtained without fraud or collusion or the like) are binding on the reversioner.

An alienation made by a female heir in possession is good against her for her life, but is not necessarily binding on the reversioner, to whom, if it be invalid, a cause of action accrues on the death of the female heir.

Where property the estate in which has descended to a female heir, never reaches her hands, but is held adversely to her by a stranger, the cause of action for a suit for the recovery of the property accrues at the commencement of the adverse possession by the stranger, and a suit to enforce that cause of action will be barred both against the female heir and against the reversioner after the expiration of the statutory period of limitation counting from the commencement of the adverse possession, the stranger having after the expiration of that period acquired an absolute indefeasible title to the property.

The enactment of art. 142 in the schedule to Act No. IX of 1871 and of art. 141 in the schedule to Act No. XV of 1877 has not made any alteration in the law as laid down in the last preceding rule.

In the suit out of which this appeal arose the principal plaintiffs claimed possession of a certain village as reversionary heirs of their maternal grandfather, one Paltan Singh. The village in suit formed part of the estate of Paltan Singh, who died about 1822, leaving him surviving two widows, viz., Harnam Kunwari, who died in January 1857, and Asman Kunwari, who predeceased her co-wife. Some time before 1857, Harnam Kunwari alienated the village in suit to one Harnam Pathak, the predecessor in title of the defendants-respondents. Paltan Singh also left him surviving three daughters, namely, Musammam Rachpali (the mother of the two first plaintiffs), who died in June 1858, Musammam Jairaji, who died without issue in May 1879, and Musammam Dilraji, who died without issue in November 1890. The suit was instituted on the 30th of March 1894.

On the first of the issues framed by it the Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur) held that the cause of action to contest the sale accrued on the death of the vendor Harnam Kunwari in January 1857, and that it became barred by limitation some time in 1869 under the limitation contained in cl. 12 of s. 1 of Act No. XIV of 1859, which prescribes a period of twelve years from the time when the cause of action arose as the [359] limitation period within which a suit to recover immoveable property must be brought. The Subordinate Judge consequently dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellants.

Munshi Ram Prasad and Babu Durga Charun Banerji, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, J.—The property in dispute in the present appeal is the village of Kot Kambharya. The plaintiffs, Babu Hanuman Prasad Singh and Babu Jadu Nath Singh, who are now appellants, claim to be entitled to, and ask to be put in possession of, it as being the grandsons of Babu Paltan Singh, deceased. There are two other persons arrayed as plaintiffs who are transferees in respect of 8 annas of the property under a deed executed in their favour by Babu Hanuman Prasad Singh and Babu Jadu Nath Singh, dated the 16th of February, 1894.

Babu Paltan Singh died in 1299 Fasli, which corresponds with 1822 A.D. He left him surviving two widows and three daughters, but no male issue. The appellants are the sons of Rachpal Kunwari, the eldest of the three said daughters.

The appellants contend that under the Hindu Law each of the widows and of the daughters was entitled to nothing further than a life interest in the property. Both the widows according to them came into possession of the entire estate upon the death of Babu Paltan Singh. Upon the death of one of the two, Musammat Harnam Kunwari, the surviving widow continued to be recorded in the Collector's records as in possession. While thus in possession she, without right or legal necessity, made a gift of the property to one Harnam Pathak, the ancestor of the respondents, and got mutation of names recorded in his favour. The respondents are still in possession, and the present suit is for their ejectment in favour of the appellants.

On the 5th of February, 1857, Musammat Harnam Kunwari died and was succeeded by the three daughters. Each of these died in turn; the date on which the last of them died is the 3rd of [360] March 1890, and it is on this date that the appellants maintain that their cause of action accrued, as it was on this date that they first became entitled to succeed as heirs to Babu Paltan Singh.

One of the pleas raised in defence was that the claim was barred by limitation.

The Subordinate Judge held that the cause of action accrued to the appellants on the expiry of twelve years from the date of the death of Musammat Harnam Kunwari and that the suit was governed by Act No XIV of 1859. The suit had therefore to be brought within twelve years from the time when the cause of action arose. The twelve years of dispossession which followed upon the death of Musammat Harnam Kunwari barred the daughter's right and also barred the plaintiffs, and he therefore dismissed the claim.

The only question which was argued, and which arises for decision, is whether the suit was or was not barred by limitation.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that the case is not governed by Act XIV of 1859, but by art. 141 of sch. ii of Act No. XV of 1877. This article provides that in the case of suits by a Hindu entitled to the possession of immoveable property on the death of a Hindu female, the period of limitation prescribed within which the suit can be brought is twelve years from the date when the female in question dies. The possession of the respondents could not begin to run adversely to the appellants until the 3rd of March, 1890, the date on which the last surviving daughter of Babu Paltan Singh died.

It is further contended that under the Hindu Law widows and daughters take a qualified estate, which is interposed between that of the last male owner and the next male reversioner, and that as between the family and a stranger each such widow or daughter represents the inheritance for the time being. The appellants, who are sons of one of the daughters, do not claim from or under their mother, but they claim as the next male sapindas of their maternal grandfather, into possession of whose estate, however, they could not come until all the widows and daughters had passed away. So [361] far as Act No. XIV of 1859 is concerned it is contended that it contained no provision which could bar such a right as that of the appellants. At the outside all that it did was to take away the remedy under that Act. The right survived and under it the appellants could maintain their present claim.

In support of their contention we were referred to Sambasiva v. Ragava (1), to Cursandas Govindji v. Vundravandas Purshotam (2) and to Mukta v. Dada valad Supadu (3).

(1) 13 M. 512.

(2) 14 B. 482.

(3) 18 B. 216.

The respondents on the other hand support the judgment of the learned Subordinate Judge. They take their stand upon the ground that any right the appellants may have had became extinct under Act No. XIV of 1859, and could not and cannot now be revived. In support of this view they cited Babu valad Sheik Ibrahim v. Bhikaji (1), Nobin Chunder Chuckerbutty v. Issur Chunder Chuckerbutty (2), Amirto Lall v. Rajonee Kant Mitter (3), Srinath Kur v. Prosunno Kumar Ghose, a Full Bench case, (4), and Hari Nath Chatterjee v. Mothurmohun Goswami (5).

"No suit," so runs Act No. XIV of 1859, s. 1, "shall be maintained in any Court of Judicature unless the same is instituted within the period of limitation hereinafter made applicable to a suit of that nature, any Law or Regulation to the contrary notwithstanding." According to them the cause of action arose on the death of Musammat Harnam Kunwari on the 5th of January, 1857. Within twelve years from that date the daughters of Paltan Singh should have instituted their suit to recover the property out of the hands of Harnam Pathak. They did not do so, and by the beginning of 1869 no suit to recover could be maintained in any Court of Judicature.

In this contention, however, the respondents ignore entirely the nature of the transfer made by Musammat Harnam Kunwari, and they also with it ignore the circumstances which constitute the cause of action upon which the appellants have come to Court. [362] Assuming for the moment the contention of the appellants that Musammat Harnam Kunwari was acting under the press of no legal necessity, she had no power to bind the inheritance as against the reversioners. All that she could do was to give to Harnam Pathak such an interest as she herself possessed, viz., an interest conterminous with her own life. Whatever might be the language of the deed by which she purported to convey the property, this is all she could convey. The respondents in their written statements have set out nothing from which it could be inferred that as against her Harnam Pathak set up any position from which any higher title or adverse possession could be inferred.

Again, the appellants set out as their cause of action the death of Musammat Dilraj Kunwari, and say that it did not arise until then. Their position is that they are the heirs of Babu Paltan Singh, and that they now seek to succeed to his estate. They could not do so as long as there lay interposed between them the lives of Paltan Singh's widows and daughters. During that period their right remained dormant, but, upon the death of the last survivor of these ladies the right at once revived and accrued against all who might seek to keep them out of their right. In this view the neglect or omission of the daughters of Paltan Singh to bring any suit against the respondents can in no way affect the appellants' interests. Their cause of action was not the appellants' cause of action, and, as already stated, there was no direct assertion of any adverse possession as against the appellants made during this interval. The respondents could not in the lifetime of the daughters acquire any higher interest than they had already acquired, except by some overt act of adverse possession. The view taken in I.L.R., 13 Mad. 512, is the view which I am prepared to take.

There is much force, too, in what was said by Parsons, J., in Cur-sandas Govindji v. Vundravandas Purshotam (6), that the right of the heir cannot be taken away by the conduct of the widow, but by the act of the owner of the paramount estate : [363] only his act or some act of the respondents evidencing adverse possession would operate to divest him of the estate which is conferred upon him by inheritance.

The cases cited by the respondents differ materially. In the first, viz., Babu valad Sheik Ibrahim v. Bhikaji (1), which was a second appeal, one Ram Chandra, a separated Hindu, had died leaving him surviving his widow Janki and a son Ganu. Ganu succeeded to the property and then died leaving him surviving his widow Sarasvatibai and his mother Janki. Sarasvatibai lived with her brother ; Janki remained in possession of the property left by Ram Chandra. Janki mortgaged the property to her brother in 1854-55, and in 1862 she sold it free from mortgage to the defendants, who at once took possession. Janki died on March 6th, 1874, and afterwards Sarasvatibai died without ever having had possession of the property. In this case, therefore, as both the Courts found that the possession of Janki and of her alienees was adverse to the widow Sarasvatibai, they could not do otherwise than hold that the adverse possession of Janki and her alienees for more than twelve years was a bar, not only to Sarasvatibai but also to the claim of the reversionary heirs on her death; but, as already noted above, in the present case, I can find no trace of any adverse possession with the respondents during the lifetime of either Paltan Singh's widows or daughters as against the appellants. Much stress was laid upon the case of Nobin Chunder Chuckerbutty (2). It was a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court, and was relied upon in support of the contention that where the cause of action had been extinguished under Act No. XIV of 1859, no new cause of action could accrue by virtue of any of the provisions contained in the succeeding Limitation Acts. But looked at carefully the precedent is one which tells strongly in favour of the appellants. As pointed out by Sir Barnes Peacock in that case, and concurred in by the other Judges, it is settled Hindu law that the wife takes as heir to her husband in default of issue, and upon her death [364] those persons succeed as reversionary heirs who would have been the heirs of the husband if he had died at that time. "It is a very anomalous position that a person should take as heir, and that his right to take as heir should be determined, according to a state of facts not existing at the time of the death of the ancestor, but caused by events which may have occurred many years after his death."

"These considerations," he adds, "lead me to the conclusion that a reversionary heir, who is bound by a decision against a widow respecting the subject matter of inheritance, is also barred by limitation, if, without fraud or collusion, the widow is barred by limitation."

Applying that rule to the present case, as no adverse possession is established against the widows or the daughters, the appellants are not to be held as injuriously affected by the mere fact that throughout this period the respondents have held this land under a title which could not convey to them anything further than the life-estate of a Hindu widow. This was their only title, and as they never asserted adverse possession they must be deemed to have held it under that title. This principle was approved by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Amirto Lal Bose v. Rajonee Kant Mitter (3). That was a case by a reversionary heir claiming succession, but also a case in which it had been found that the widow, whose life-estate intervened between him and his inheritance, had been dispossessed by trespassers who set up and maintained adverse possession under which the title of the widow to a life-estate, and therefore of the reversioners, both became extinguished. The case of Srinath Kur v. Prosunno Kumar Ghose (1) decides nothing more than this, that the rule laid down under the Limitation Act of 1859 is no longer the law under the Acts of 1871 and 1877, and that a reversioner who succeeds to immovable property has now twelve years to bring his suit from the time when his estate falls into possession. In this case, the estate did not fall into possession till the last daughter [365] died, viz., on March 3rd, 1890. In the case of Hari Nath Chatterjee v. Mothurmohun Goswami (2) Sampurna, whose position the Privy Council held was similar to the position of a Hindu widow, had been found to be never in possession of the estate under dispute, and that her claim to it was already barred by limitation at a time when Act No. XIV of 1859 was in force. The contention that the Act of 1877 gave the reversionary heir a new cause of action simply because Sampurna died in 1884 was naturally rejected; he was held bound by the decree which had been passed against Sampurna, and their Lordships of the Privy Council pointed out that the intention of the law of limitation is not to give a right where there is not one but to interpose a bar after a certain period to a suit to enforce the existing right. In the present case, the right had continued to exist until 1890, and was subject to no bar created by the Act of 1859. The same distinction runs through, and is very clearly brought out in, the case of Mussummat Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh and Mussummat Lachhan Kunwar v. Manorath Ram (3).

(1) 14 B. 317.

(3) 23 W. R. 214.

For the above reasons I hold that the cause of action in the present case accrued to appellants on the death of the last surviving daughter, and that their suit is amply within time. I would therefore allow this appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the lower Court, and remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the lower Court with directions to enter it on its list of pending cases and dispose of it according to law. Costs to abide the event.

BURKITT, J.—This is an appeal from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur, by which he dismissed the plaintiffs' suit on the ground that it was barred by limitation. The suit was for the possession of a village to which the plaintiffs Hanuman Prasad and Jadu Nath Prasad (the other plaintiffs are their assignees) asserted title as reversionary heirs of their maternal grandfather, one Paltan Singh. There is no dispute about the preliminary facts. The village in suit was part of the estate left [366] by Paltan Singh, who died about 1822, A. D., leaving him surviving two widows, namely, (1) Harnam Kunwari, who died in January 1857, and (2) Asman Kunwari, who predeceased her co-wife. Sometime before 1857 Harnam Kunwari sold the village in dispute—the sale which is impugned in this suit—to the predecessor in interest of the defendants-respondents. Paltan Singh also left him surviving three daughters, namely, (1) Musammatt Rachpali (mother of the first two plaintiffs), who died in June 1858, (2) Musammatt Jairaji, who died without issue in May 1879, and (3) Musammatt Dilraji, who died without issue in November 1890. This suit was instituted in March 1894.

On the first of the many issues fixed by him for trial, the Subordinate Judge held that the cause of action to contest the sale accrued on the death of the widow Harnam Kunwari in January 1857, and that it became barred by limitation sometime in 1869 under the limitation contained in clause 12 of s. 1 of Act No. XIV of 1859, which prescribes a period of twelve years from the time when the cause of action arose as the limitation period within which a suit to recover immoveable property must be brought.

For the plaintiffs, it was contended, and the contention is repeated in this appeal, that the limitation rule applicable is that prescribed by art. 141 of the second schedule to the present Limitation Act (Act No. XV of 1877), which, in the case of a suit by a Hindu or Muhammadan entitled to the possession of immoveable property on the death of a female, prescribes a limitation period of twelve years from the time when the female dies. The appellant's contention is that, as the estate came into possession only on the death of the last survivor of Paltan Singh's daughters in 1890, they have a period of twelve years from her death within which they can sue. The respondents support the decision of the Court below.

A large number of cases were cited at bar and by the Court during the argument at the hearing of this appeal, viz., Sambasiva [367] v. Ragava (1) Hari Nath Chatterjee v. Mothurmohun Goswami (2) Cursandas Govindji v. Vundravandas Purshotam (3), Mukta v. Dada valad Supadu (4), Nobin Chunder Chuckerbutty v. Issur Chunder Chuckerbutty (5), Appasami Odayar v. Subramanya Odayar (6), Babu valad Sheik Ibrahim v. Bhikaji (7), Amirto Lal Bose Rajonee Kant Mittler (8), Ram Kali v. Kedar Nath (9), Lachhan Kunwar v. Manorath Ram (10) and Drobomoyi Gupta v. Davis (11).

The above cases may be roughly divided into two classes, the first being that in which the widow or other female, in succession to (but not through) whom the reversioner claimed, had been dispossessed or had been kept out of and had not obtained possession of the property, e.g., by a trespasser, by a decree of Court or the like.

The case of Nobin Chunder Chuckerbutty v. Issur Chunder Chuckerbutty (5), was one in which a separated Hindu died leaving him surviving two sons, two daughters and a widow. The sons died without issue in the life-time of their mother, upon whom their respective estates then descended as heir. The mother, however, never got possession, as on the death of the sons a stranger, a trespasser, entered on the property and took and retained possession. On suit by the daughters' sons for possession after the death of the mother (the limitation law applicable being Act No. XIV of 1859) it was contended for the reversioners that they had acquired a fresh cause of action on the death of the mother. It was held on the authority of the Shiva Ganga case (12), that, if the mother had sued the trespasser for possession and (without fraud or collusion) had failed to make out her case, the reversionary heirs would have been bound by the decision, and that on the same principle the adverse possession against her was adverse also to the reversioners, the reason being "that the widow [368] fully represents the estate, and it is also settled law that adverse possession which bars her bars the heir also after her." As to an alienation made by a female heir it was held that no cause of action would accrue to her against her grantee, who would not be a wrong-doer, during her life, but that the alienation would not be binding against the reversioner. The cause of action would not arise till her death, when the reversioner's cause of action for the first time accrues. As to the case in which the female never got possession of the property, it having been held adversely to her and never having reached her hands, it was held that the suit to recover the property by ejectment of the wrongdoer must be brought within twelve years from the commencement of the adverse possession. The meaning of the learned Judges who decided this case clearly was that in such a case the cause of action arose once and for all on the commencement of the trespass. This case was cited with approval by their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Amirto Lal Bose v. Rajonee Kant Mitter.⁽¹⁾

In Babu valad Sheik Ibrahim v. Bhikaji (2), a separated Hindu died leaving him surviving his widow and a son. The son succeeded to the property and died leaving a widow, on whom his estate descended as heir. The son's widow, however, was kept out of possession by her mother-in-law (the father's widow), who had no title to the property, but who retained possession of it and ultimately sold it. Subsequently, on suit brought by the son's reversioners after the death of the son's widow, it was held (following the two cases above cited) that the possession of the usurping mother-in-law and of her alienees was adverse, not only to the true heir, the son's widow, but also to the son's reversioners. The case was one under Act No. XIV of 1859, and the Court considered it unnecessary to discuss the effect of art. 142 of Act No. IX of 1871 and art. 141 of No. XV of 1877. In Hari Nath Chatterjee v. Mothurmohun Goswami (3) the plaintiff as son of the survivor of five daughters of his [369] maternal grandfather, who herself died in 1884, sued in April 1887, to recover his share in his maternal grandfather's property, from the sons and grandson of his mother's sisters. The defence was that his suit was barred by a decree obtained against his mother, who had sued for possession in 1879 against a son of one of her sisters and had been defeated. Their Lordships of the Privy Council, after referring to the changes in the law of limitation from Act No. XIV of 1859 to Act No. IX of 1871 and Act No. XV of 1877, cited the judgment in the Shiva Ganga case (4), in which it had been held that an adverse decree in a suit brought by a Hindu widow for possession of a zamindari as heir to her husband would, if it had become final in her life-time, have bound those claiming in succession to her, and would have barred any new suit by any person claiming in succession to her unless the decree could be successfully impeached on some special ground. Their Lordships then went on to remark that the judgments in Nobin Chunder v. Issur Chunder (5) and in Amirto Lal Bose v. Rajonee Kant (1) were not directly applicable (no doubt because those cases turned on adverse possession against the female heir and not on a decree of Court), and held that the estate to which the plaintiff's mother had succeeded was similar to the estate of a widow, and that the principle of those decisions would apply to it. Their Lordships then considered the contention that (the law being as described in the three cases cited above when Act No. IX of 1871 was passed), the effect of art. 142 in the sch. to Act No. IX of 1871 and of art. 141 in the sch. to Act No. XV of 1877 was that a decree founded on the law of limitation was now exempted from the rule laid down in the Shiva Ganga case (4), and that the decree in the plaintiff's mother's suit of 1879 only bound her, and that the plaintiff had under art. 141 a period of twelve years from her death to bring a suit. For that contention their Lordships could see no ground. They held that the words in art. 141 "entitled to the possession of immoveable [370] property" referred to the then existing law, under which the plaintiff would not, (by reason of the adverse decree) be entitled to bring a suit for possession, the intention of the law of limitation being not to give a right where there is not one, but to interpose a bar, after a certain period, to bar a suit to enforce an existing right; and finally their Lordships say that art. 141 cannot be construed as altering the law respecting the effect of a decree. In Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh (1) the facts are the same as in Babu valad Sheik Ibrahim v. Bhikaji (2) cited above. A Hindu widow took possession of her husband's property to the exclusion of her son's widow, the true heir, and held possession for twenty-five years. Their Lordships held that if she took possession absolutely and without any qualification, her possession would be a bar to the title of all persons who could claim as reversioners. Their Lordships approved of the decision then under appeal, in which it was held that the trespasser by virtue of her adverse possession had acquired an absolute indefeasible title to the property, extinguishing not merely the title of the next heir (the son and after him his widow), but also that of the reversioners expectant on the death of the son's widow. The last of this class of cases to which I would refer is that of Appasami Odayar v. Subramanya Odayar. (3) The suit in it was brought to recover the plaintiff's share in joint ancestral property from which the plaintiff alleged he had been excluded by the defendants. It was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that the plaintiff's suit had been barred by clause 13 of s. 1 of Act No. XIV of 1859, which prescribed twelve years from the date of the last participation in the profits of the estate as the limitation period, and their Lordships further held that the right to sue could not have been revived by the later limitation Acts. They also held [as in Hari Nath Chatterjee v. Mothurmohun (4)] that if the limitation Acts had altered the law (of limitation), they had not revived the right of suit. This case therefore, though it is not one of a suit by a [371] reversioner claiming on the death of a female, is of importance on the limitation question.

From a consideration of the above cases it seems to me that the following rules can be deduced, namely, (1) that decrees affecting immoveable property obtained against a female heir in respect of the subject-matter of the inheritance (if obtained without fraud or collusion or the like) are binding on the reversioner:—(2) that an alienation made by a female heir in possession is good against her for her life, but is not necessarily binding on the reversioner, to whom, if it be invalid, a cause of action accrues on the death of the female heir:—(3) that where property, the estate in which has descended to a female heir, never reaches her hands, but is held adversely to her by a stranger, the cause of action for a suit for the recovery of the property accrues at the commencement of the adverse possession by the stranger, and a suit to enforce that cause of action will be barred both against the female heir and against the reversioner after the expiration of the statutory period of limitation counting from the commencement of the adverse possession, the stranger having after the expiration of that period acquired an absolute indefeasible title to the property, and (4) that the enactment of art. 142 in the schedule to Act No. IX of 1871 and of art. 141 in the schedule to Act No. XV of 1877 has not made any alteration in the law laid down in the last preceding rule.

In the second class of cases the first I would cite is Sambasiva v. Ragava (1). In it the facts are that a separated Hindu died in 1845, leaving him surviving, a widow, who died in 1846, and two daughters, the survivor of whom died in 1883. The plaintiff, a son of the last-mentioned daughter, sued in 1887 to set aside an alienation made by the other daughter in 1850 while she was in possession of her father's property. The District Judge held that the suit became barred by limitation in 1862 under Act No. XIV of 1859. The High Court, however, on appeal took a different view, remarking:—"We take it therefore as settled law that when [372] the defendant gets into possession under an invalid alienation made by a widow his possession is not adverse against the reversioner until the widow's death, but when the defendant comes into possession by an act of trespass that the title he acquires is good as against the representative of the inheritance for the time and consequently against the reversioner." The Court further considered the argument that a suit by the plaintiff's mother to impeach the alienation would have been barred after twelve years from her sister's death and that therefore the plaintiff would be barred. The Court, however, rejected that argument, holding that the title which the alienee acquired against the plaintiff's mother by the lapse of twelve years would not be higher than that which might have been created by a conveyance from her which would not be binding on the plaintiff. It was therefore held that there was no bar of limitation against the plaintiff.

In Cursandas Govindji v. Vundravandas Purshotam (2) there was no complication of any kind. The plaintiff reversioner sued within twelve years from the death of the survivor of the two widows of the last male owner, and the Court held he was not time-barred, remarking that as long as either of the widows lived, the plaintiff had no right of action and could not sue for possession. This case was followed and approved in Mukta v. Dada valad Supadu (3).

Ramkali v. Kedar Nath (4), is undoubtedly a strong case. The facts in it resemble very much those in Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh (5), and are that a separated Hindu died in 1862 leaving a widow and daughter, but no son. The estate descended to the widow, but possession never reached her, as a nephew of her husband (who had no title whatever as long as the widow and daughter lived) took possession of the property, and retained possession for twenty-five years up to the death of the widow in 1887. The daughter then sued for possession, and it was held by the Court that art. 141 of the second schedule to the Act No. XV of 1877 applied, that the plaintiff had twelve years from [373] the death of the widow in 1887 within which to sue, and that the suit was not time-barred, as the limitation period began to run from the death of the widow. It is not easy to reconcile the decision in this case with that in Hari Nath Chatterjee and in Lachhan Kunwar and others of the cases cited above, and possibly the decision may have to be reconsidered.

In Drobomoyi Gupta v. Davis (6), the facts are that a Hindu widow created a peculiar kind of tenure in favour of certain tenants and died in 1861. She was succeeded by her two daughters, the survivor of whom died in December 1880. The plaintiffs sued as reversioners (daughter's sons) in 1884 for possession of the land by ejectment of the tenure holders. It appeared that the plaintiff's predecessors, the two daughters, had in 1873 taken proceedings against the tenure holders, seeking to oust them on the ground that the instruments which constituted the tenure were forged. That suit failed. It was held that the reversioners were barred by limitation. There was also a question of res judicata, but the Court refused to adjudicate on it. On the question of limitation—and this is the reason why the case was cited here by the appellant—the Court observed that the possession of the tenure holders was not adverse to the widow, and if it could be shown that the daughters had ratified the settlement, the possession would not have been adverse to them either. But as the daughters, instead of ratifying the settlement, did everything they could to upset it, and impugned the documents constituting it as forgeries and denied that they were bound by them even if genuine, the Court held that the possession of these tenure holders was adverse to the daughters and to their successors the plaintiffs.

From the above it will be seen that, with the exception of the case of Ram Kali v. Kedarnath (1), all the cases of this second class have been decided in accordance with some one or other of the four rules set forth above.

Now, applying the rules of law laid down in the cases above cited to the appeal before me, I remark that there is not in [374] this case any adverse possession by a stranger or trespasser against the true heir, as there was in the cases of Nobin Chunder, Babu valad Ibrahim, Lachhan Kunwar and Ram Kali. Nor is there any adverse decree, as in the case of Hari Nath Chatterjee and Drobomoyi Gupta. There is here an alienation, possibly invalid, created by the widow shortly before her death in 1857, and there is the fact that the next set of female heirs, the daughters, between 1857 and the death of the survivor of them in 1890, made no attempt to set aside the alienation. Had they made such an attempt and failed, I certainly should hold that the decree in their suit would, in the absence of fraud or collusion or the like, be binding on the reversioners, the plaintiffs. It may be that a suit by the daughters would have been barred by limitation after 1869. It is unnecessary for me to decide that point. But, assuming that it would have been so barred, is the suit by the present reversioners also barred? The contention is that the reversioner's cause of action was barred under Act XIV of 1859. If that were so, it would not be revived by art. 141 of the second schedule to the Limitation Act, 1877. I am of opinion that the suit is not so barred. This is not a case in which, as in Nobin Chunder's case, it could be held that the cause of action accrued once and for all on the commencement of a wrongful possession, but is one of an alienation created by a female heir while in lawful possession. I take it that during the period between 1857 and 1890 the daughters, not having taken any steps to set aside the alienation, must be considered to have acquiesced in and ratified it, and the title which the alienee might acquire against them by twelve years' adverse possession of their interests in the property under such acquiescence or ratification, being possession only of the limited interest of a Hindu female heir, would not in my opinion be adverse to nor bar the reversioners. The reversioners had no title to sue for possession of the property during the life-time of the female heirs, and there is no law compelling reversioners to sue to set aside invalid alienations made by a female heir in possession, [375] such alienation not being binding on the reversioners. It would be different on the authorities if the female heir while in possession was dispossessed by a trespasser, or if such heir never got possession. In such a case the reversioner would be bound by the adverse possession obtained by the trespasser, if prolonged beyond the statutory limit, as also he would be bound by a decree adverse to the female heir affecting the property. But in the present case I am clearly of opinion that the suit is not barred by any rule, there being no adverse possession by a trespasser nor any adverse decree of Court affecting the property. I would therefore set aside the finding of the Subordinate Judge on the first issue and also his decree founded on that finding dismissing the suit, and, as his decree proceeds on a preliminary point, I would, under s 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, remand the record to him for trial of the remaining issues.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

BAKHSI KISHEN PRASAD AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. THAKUR DAS AND OTHERS (Defendants).* [14th April, 1897.]

Muhammadian law--Shias--Marriage between a Muhammadian woman and a Christian--Invalidity of such marriage.

A Muhammadian woman of the Shia sect cannot contract a valid marriage according to Muhammadan rites with a Christian.

THE suit out of which this appeal arose was one for redemption of a mortgage of a 9 biswa share in a certain village. The plaintiffs alleged that on the 8th of January 1865, Mussamat Husaini Begam usufructually mortgaged to the defendants' ancestors Ganga Bishan and Mathura, Das a 9 biswa share in mauza Rachora together with Naglas Mohari, Sumerpur and Kachhia Nain, the mortgage being usufructuary for principal and interest; that after the death of Husaini Begam the entire mauza devolved upon her husband Mr. Linnæus Gardner, who, on the 21st December 1838, hypothecated the entire mauza to Bakhshi Nand Kishore and [376] Dwarka Das; that on the 24th of June 1874 Nand Kishore and Mussamat Champa, the widow of Dwarka Das obtained a decree against Linnæus Gardner, on the hypothecation bond for the sale of the entire mauza; that in execution of this decree the mauza was sold and was purchased by Nand Kishore and Mussamat Teja, mother and representative of the other mortgagee, who obtained possession; that subsequently Mussamat Teja transferred her half share to Kishore Lal, one of the plaintiffs, and Nand Kishore died and was succeeded by the remaining plaintiffs as his heirs; that the mortgage in favour of the defendants had been fully satisfied by the usufruct, but that if anything remained due they were willing to pay the necessary amount.

The defendants resisted the suit upon various grounds, inter alia that Linnæus Gardner was not the legal heir of Husaini Begam. The ground of this contention was that Husaini Begam, being a Muhammadan of the Shia sect, could not, although she had gone through the ceremony of marriage with him according to the Muhammadan ritual lawfully become the wife of Linnæus Gardner, he being a Christian. On this point an issue was framed by the Court of first instance (additional Subordinate Judge of Aligarh) and was decided in the negative. The Court of first instance accordingly dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for redemption of a mortgage of a nine biswa share made by one Husaini Begam in 1865 in favour of the predecessors in title of the defendants. Husaini Begam was a Muhammadan lady of the Shiah persuasion, who had gone through the ceremony of marriage according to Muhammadan rites with Mr. Linnæus Gardner, who was a Christian. The plaintiffs derive their title under a mortgage made in favour of their ancestor in 1868 by the said Linnæus Gardner after the death of Husaini Begam. The plaintiffs obtained a decree upon that mortgage, and in execution thereof caused the [377] mortgaged property, which included the nine biswas now claimed, to be sold at auction and purchased it themselves. It is by virtue of this purchase that they have advanced the present claim. The defendants were not joined as parties to the suit brought upon the mortgage of 1868. They resisted the present claim, on the ground, among others, that the plaintiffs had no title to redeem, inasmuch as their mortgagor Linnæus Gardner was not the legal heir and representative of Husaini Begam, his alleged marriage with that lady being void under the Muhammadan Law. This plea has been sustained by the Court below, and the claim has been dismissed.

The first contention raised in this appeal has reference to the correctness of the finding of the lower Court against the validity of the marriage of Linnæus Gardner with Husaini Begam. The Subordinate Judge has based his decision upon passages to be found on pages 30 and 40 of Baillie's Digest of Muhammadan Law, Imameea Code. It is there laid down that if the wife of a Kitabee should embrace the faith of Islam, that circumstance would cancel the marriage. The author infers from this that a Muhammadan cannot be legally married to anyone who is not of that faith. At page 40 it is stated that a Muhammadan woman cannot enter into a moota contract with any other than one of her own religion. Since a moota or temporary marriage cannot be entered into by a Muhammadan woman with any one other than a Muhammadan, it follows as a natural inference that a permanent marriage valid according to Muhammadan Law cannot be contracted under similar circumstances. No authority to the contrary has been shown to us on this point. We think that the decision of the Court below must be upheld. As the alleged marriage of Linnæus Gardner with Husaini Begam was thus an invalid marriage, the property left by that lady could not be inherited by him, according to Muhammadan Law.

It is next contended that under a custom prevailing in the family to which Husaini Begam belonged, such a marriage was regarded as valid. The evidence as to this is in our opinion [378] insufficient to establish the custom set up, and does not justify our acting upon it.

The defendants mortgagees were not bound to surrender the mortgaged property to anyone who could not establish a title to the equity of redemption as against them. As the person from whom the plaintiffs derived title had, according to the above finding, no right to the property mortgaged to the defendants, the plaintiffs acquired no higher title than that possessed by their mortgagor, and they had no right to claim redemption.

It was urged on behalf of the appellants that the defendants mortgagees were by their conduct precluded from denying the title of the plaintiffs. This contention was based on the fact that in 1872 the defendants brought two suits upon two simple mortgages executed by Husaini Begam in which they described Linnæus Gardner as the heir and legal representative of Husaini Begam, and it is stated that by reason of the defendants so describing Linnæus Gardner the plaintiffs were induced to purchase his interest in the property now in question. Had it been shown that it was in consequence of the description of Linnæus Gardner above referred to that the plaintiffs purchased the property, the provisions of s. 115 of the Indian Evidence Act might have applied, and the defendants might have been held estopped from denying the plaintiffs' title, but anything which took place in 1872 could not have induced the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs to take a mortgage of the property from Linnæus Gardner in 1868, or the plaintiffs to purchase that property in execution of the decree obtained on that mortgage. In our opinion therefore the plea of estoppel cannot be sustained. We affirm the decree below and dismiss the appeal with costs.

There are objections under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure on behalf of the respondents, as to the disallowance of costs to the respondents by the Court below. Those objections are in our opinion untenable.

It appears that in dakhil kharij proceedings the defendants stated that until the plaintiffs brought a suit for redemption they [379] would not be entitled to obtain possession of the property. In those proceedings they did not deny the plaintiffs' title. Under these circumstances the Court below exercised a proper discretion in not allowing costs.

We dismiss the objections.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

[380] KNOX, J.—One Jhamman Singh, on the 23rd of January, 1894, executed two separate mortgage deeds over a $3\frac{3}{4}$ biswa share of zamindari property situate in mauza Ankheri. One of these was in favour of Param-sukh and the second in favour of Puran Mal.

On the 22nd of January, 1886, each of the mortgagees, as represented by their heirs, instituted a separate suit against Jhamman Singh for recovery of the mortgage money and for enforcement of his lien over the mortgaged property. In each case the other mortgagee was made no party to the suit.

The suit brought by the heirs of Paramsukh terminated in a decree on the 1st of March, 1886, and that brought by the heirs of Puran Mal in a decree dated the 5th of April, 1886.

Sangari, the heir of Puran Mal, brought the property to sale on the 20th of July, 1888, and purchased it. The heirs of Paramsukh, the appellants, did the same on the 20th of April 1889, and also themselves purchased it. Musammat Sangari had, however, been first in securing mutation of names in her favour in the Collector's records and in getting possession over the property, and she applied for partition. The appellants objected, but as they were not in possession, their objection was disallowed.

They accordingly instituted the present suit claiming that a decree might be given declaring their lien to be prior to that of Musammat Sangari, or that a moiety of the property might be awarded them, or that they might be allowed to redeem the mortgage, subject to the payment of Musammat Sangari's lien. The Judge held that, as Balmakund in his first suit could, and should, have made Musammat Sangari a party to the case, and settled the question of proof and of priority and of his right to redeem, and as he had not done so, he could bring no second suit for the purpose under s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He based his decision to this effect upon an unreported decision of this Court in F.A. No. 190 of 1889, and dismissed the appellants' suit.

The appellants then came to this Court contending that their suit was not barred by s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure. [381] The Division Bench of this Court considering that this point had been dealt with differently in two unreported decisions of this Court, viz., F. A. No. 190 of 1889, decided on the 22nd of June, 1891, and S. A.

No. 1042 of 1892, dated the 20th of July 1895, referred the point for decision by a Full Bench of this Court.

It is admitted that Jhamman is not a necessary party to this suit. We are unanimously of opinion that the suit is not barred by s. 43. That section is one which has no reference to array of parties. We are not now concerned with the former suit instituted by the appellants. The contention was pressed upon us that as s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act required that in the first suit brought by the appellant Musammat Sangari should have been joined as a party, and as the appellants were entitled when they brought their first suit both to the remedy against Jhamman Singh, viz., recovery of the mortgage money and enforcement of their lien in default, and to the remedy against Musammat Sangari, viz., redemption of the mortgaged property, subject to the payment of what was due to Musammat Sangari in respect of their cause of action, and as they omitted to sue for the latter remedy they cannot now sue for it.

This contention is based upon a misconception of the term 'cause of action.'

The appellants had two separate causes of action at the time they instituted this suit in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Aligarh, namely, that against Jhamman Singh and that against Musammat Sangari. The object with which s. 85 was specially enacted was to enable the various incumbrances on one property (and each incumbrance represents a separate cause of action) to be brought into one suit and so save multiplicity of actions. It was never intended to, and could never operate as a section fusing all causes of action arising out of each incumbrance into one consolidated cause of action. The provisions of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act and of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure in no way govern the present suit.

I would therefore dismiss Jhamman Singh from the suit.

[382] I would allow the appeal as against Musammat Sangari, and, setting aside the judgment and decree of the lower Court on the preliminary point, would remand the case to the Court below with directions to restore it to its file of pending appeals and dispose of it according to law.

BANERJI, J.—The question we have to determine upon this reference is whether the suit of the plaintiffs appellants offends against the 43rd section of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts out of which the question has arisen are these. One Jhamman Singh executed two simple mortgages of the same property on the 23rd of January, 1874, one in favour of Param Sukh and the other in favour of Puran Mal. In 1886, the legal representatives of the two mortgagees, who had in the meantime died, brought two suits for sale, one in respect of each mortgage, and a decree for sale was made in each suit. Neither plaintiff joined the other mortgagee as a party to his suit. Musammat Sangari, the widow and legal representative of Puran Mal, caused the property now in suit, which was a part of the mortgaged property, to be sold in execution of her decree on the 20th of July, 1888, and purchased it herself. Subsequently, on the 20th of April, 1889, the legal representatives of the other mortgagee caused the same property to be sold in execution of their decree, and the present plaintiffs became the purchasers. Musammat Sangari, however, obtained possession. Thereupon the present suit was brought. The plaintiffs alleged that the mortgage in favour of Param Sukh had priority over the other mortgage, and therefore they alone were entitled to possession of the property, and that in any case they were entitled to half the property. They further urged that as the legal representatives of Param Sukh were not parties to Sangari's suit for sale the plaintiffs were entitled to redeem the mortgage made in favour of Sangari's husband, Puran Mal. The plaintiffs accordingly sued for possession, and prayed that in the event of a decree for possession not being granted a decree should be made in their favour for redemption of Puran Mal's mortgage.

[383] The lower appellate Court has dismissed the claim for possession upon the finding that Param Sukh's mortgage was not prior to the other mortgage. It has dismissed the claim for redemption on the ground that as the representatives of Param Sukh were bound to join the other mortgagee as a party to their suit for sale and to seek to redeem the mortgage held by him, the present claim is barred by the provisions of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is the correctness of this last ruling of the learned Judge below which has been questioned in this appeal.

In my opinion the 43rd section of the Code of Civil Procedure is no bar to the plaintiff's suit for redemption of the mortgage held by Puran Mal.

That section provides against what is called the splitting of a cause of action, and is founded on the maxim that no one shall be twice vexed for one and the same cause. (See Whitley Stokes' Anglo-Indian Codes, Vol. II, p. 490.) The section in my opinion forbids the institution of a second suit against the same defendant or his representatives in interest upon the same cause of action which was the foundation of the first suit. As observed by their Lordships of the Privy Council in The Rajah of Pittapur v. Sri Rajah Venkata Mahipati Surya (1) with reference to the corresponding section of Act No. VIII of 1859,—“that section does not say that every suit shall include every cause of action or every claim which the party has, but ‘every suit shall include the whole of the claim arising out of the cause of action’—meaning the cause of action for which the suit is brought,” that is, as s. 43 of Act No. XIV of 1882 sets forth, “the whole of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect of the cause of action.” It is clear that in order that the said section may be applicable two things are essential: first, that both the suits must arise out of the same cause of action; and, secondly, that they must be between the same parties or between parties under whom they or any of them claim. Unless the cause of [384] action be the same, there cannot be an omission or relinquishment of any portion of the claim which the plaintiff is entitled to make in respect thereof, and unless the defendant be the same person or his representative in interest, no one will be twice vexed for the same cause. A plaintiff's cause of action is not only the right which he asserts, but the infringement of that right by the defendant. Where the plaintiff's right is infringed by more persons than one and by different acts done separately by each of them, the plaintiff has a separate cause of action against each of those persons. The omission therefore to implead one of them in a suit brought against another cannot bar a subsequent suit against the person not so impleaded. Section 43 appears in a Chapter of the Code which relates to the frame of a suit and not to the array of parties, and this circumstance also shows that it has no application where the parties to the two suits are not the same persons or their representatives in interest. This view is supported by observations contained in the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Sabeer Khan v. Kalli Doss Dey (1).

It is contended on behalf of the respondent that, according to the ruling of the majority of the Full Bench in Matadin Kasodan v. Kazim Husain (2), a subsequent mortgagee who brings a suit for sale must redeem the prior mortgage in order to obtain a decree for sale, and that the result of this ruling is that the cause of action of a subsequent mortgagee in a suit for sale brought by him is the same both against his mortgagor and the prior mortgagee. I am unable to agree with this contention. S. 85 of Act No. IV of 1882 no doubt requires that a mortgagee bringing a suit for sale must join as a party to his suit every person who has an interest in the mortgaged property, of whose interest he has notice. As a prior mortgagee is a person who has an interest in the mortgaged property, he is a necessary party to the suit for sale brought by a puisne mortgagee, provided that the latter has notice of the prior mortgage. The omission to join such a prior mortgagee in the subsequent mortgagee's suit entails, according to [385] the ruling of the Full Bench in Matadin's case, the dismissal of the suit. But it does not bar the subsequent institution of a properly framed suit against the prior mortgagee for redemption of the mortgage. Such a bar, if it existed, must be sought elsewhere than in the Transfer of Property Act. It is urged that s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure imposes the bar. But in my opinion that section, providing as it does against the splitting of causes of action, cannot apply unless the cause of action for both the suits is the same. A puisne mortgagee's cause of action as against a prior mortgagee to redeem the prior mortgage is not the same cause of action that he has against the mortgagor for the sale of the mortgaged property. The cause of action for the claim for redemption is the plaintiff's title as subsequent mortgagee and the refusal of the prior mortgagee to grant redemption. The cause of action for the claim for sale is his title as mortgagee (and it is immaterial whether he is the first mortgagee or a subsequent mortgagee) and the refusal of the mortgagor to pay the mortgage money. These causes of action are certainly not identical, and it is not right to say that a subsequent mortgagee's suit to redeem a prior mortgage and to foreclose the right of redemption of his mortgagor is founded on the same cause of action.

In the present case Musammat Sangari ought undoubtedly to have been joined as a party to the suit brought by the legal representatives of Param Sukh, and for this non-compliance with the provisions of s. 85 of Act No. IV of 1882, their suit should, according to the ruling of the Full Bench referred to above, have been dismissed. They, however, obtained a decree against their mortgagor. The circumstance of their not joining in that suit persons who were necessary parties to it could not preclude them, or the plaintiffs, who stand in their shoes, from bringing the present suit against Musammat Sangari, who was not a party to the first suit, and will not therefore be subjected to the vexation of a second suit. Moreover, as I have shown above, the cause of action against her is not the same as that against the [386] mortgagor. The present suit is not therefore obnoxious to the bar of the former suit under s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or under any other rule of law, and it has been improperly dismissed as against Musammat Sangari.

As against Jhamman Singh, defendant, the plaintiffs had no cause of action for their present claim. He has ceased to have any interests in the property in question, those interests having passed to the other parties to the suit. He was not therefore a necessary party to the plaintiff's suit, and the decree for the dismissal of the suit as against him must be sustained.

I would allow the appeal against Musammat Sangari and remand the case to the Court below under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for trial on the merits. Costs here and hitherto follow the event.

BURKITT, J.—In this case, two persons held each a mortgage over the same property from the same mortgagor. The mortgages were both executed on the same day. The mortgagees each instituted a suit for sale on the same day and obtained decrees, in execution of which they had the mortgaged property put up for sale and each purchased it at the sale under his decree. The respondent, Musammat Sangari (widow and representative of one of the mortgagees decree-holders) took prompt measures to obtain the benefit of her purchase, got herself put into possession of the property and successfully resisted all effort of the rival mortgagees decree-holders auction purchasers to oust her. The rival mortgagees decree-holders auction purchasers have now instituted this suit in which they have impleaded all necessary (and one unnecessary) parties. They asked for three reliefs. The first has been abandoned and need not be mentioned. In the second relief, they asked for possession of a moiety of the property, and in the third, they in the alternative asked to be allowed to redeem.

The Court of first instance dismissed the suit. The plaintiffs appealed, urging that theirs was the prior mortgage and that they were entitled to redeem.

[387] The District Judge found that the appellants were not the prior mortgagees, and on the question of redemption he held that, as the appellants had not made the respondent Musammat Sangari a party, to their suit for sale on their mortgage they were debarred by s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure, from instituting this suit. He came to that decision on the strength of an obiter dictum in an unreported case in this Court.

In second appeal to this Court, the appellants contend that the learned District Judge was wrong in his decision on s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The respondent Jhamman, the original mortgagor, has been again quite unnecessarily impleaded as a respondent. He now has no possible interest in the property comprised in the mortgages. I think he should be dismissed from the suit with costs.

At the hearing of this appeal, it was admitted by the learned advocate for the respondent Musammat Sangari, that the suit as framed was not in any way barred by s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act. But he supported the ruling of the Court below that the suit was barred by the provisions of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure. His argument, as I understood it, was that the appellants when instituting their suit for sale on their mortgage ought, under s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act to have impleaded the present respondent, Musammat Sangari, who also held a mortgage of which they had notice over the property they sought to bring to sale. So far the argument of the learned advocate is sound. As a condition precedent to obtaining a decree for sale s. 85 of Act No. IV of 1882 does make it imperative on a mortgagee to implead every person having an interest in the property comprised in the mortgage of whose interest the plaintiff mortgagee has notice. The appellants certainly ought not to have got their decree, nor should the respondent Musammat Sangari, who was in pari delicto, have obtained hers. Next, the learned advocate referring to the rule established in this Court by the case of Matadin Kasodhan [388] v. Kazim Husain (1) that a puisne mortgagee seeking to bring to sale the mortgaged property must redeem a prior incumbrance and cannot sell subject to it, contended that among the remedies which the appellants had on their cause of action when suing their mortgagor for sale of the mortgaged property was one to redeem the prior incumbrance, and that, as they had not impleaded the person against whom that relief could be granted, they were barred from instituting this suit by s. 43 of the Code. To that contention I am unable to accede. Section 43 is, in my opinion, a provision as to the cause of action, and its object is to prevent the same party or his representatives from being more than once sued on the same cause of action, or on any part of it. As against their mortgagor, Jhamman, the appellants put in suit the whole of the cause of action they had against him, when they, alleging the execution of the mortgage and the failure of the mortgagor to pay the amount due on it, asked for a decree for sale of the mortgaged property in default of payment by the mortgagor. They in that way exhausted their whole cause of action against their mortgagor and did not omit or relinquish any part of it so as to subject themselves to the penalty provided by the second clause of s. 43. It is true, no doubt, that being, as found by the lower appellate Court, puisne mortgagees they had a cause of action against the respondent Musammat Sangari for redemption, and for that reason, and also because of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, they might have impleaded her and redeemed her prior mortgage. But that matter does not bring the case within s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appellants' cause of action as against their mortgagor Jhamman was not the same cause of action as that as against the respondent Musammat Sangari, their rival mortgagee. Section 43 nowhere prescribes that where one person has two distinct causes of action, different in their nature and in their incidents, respecting the same property, one against one person and other against another person, he is bound to join those causes in one suit. The section lays down no rule as to who is to be [389] impleaded as a defendant, and does no more than provide that the plaintiff must include in the relief he asks for in his plaint the whole claim he is entitled to make in respect of his cause of action against the defendant. Here, as I have shown above, the appellants did, in their suit against their mortgagor, make the whole of the claim they were entitled to make on their cause of action against him. It is the wording of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, and not that of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which rendered it incumbent on them to have impleaded the respondent and to have joined their cause of action against her in their suit against their mortgagor. But their omission to do so does not bring their present suit within the purview of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

I would therefore allow this appeal. I would dismiss the respondent, Jhamman, from the suit with costs as an unnecessary party, and, holding that the suit was not barred by s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure, I would remand the record to the lower appellate Court under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a decision on the issues remaining untried. Costs of this appeal to follow the event.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur in the conclusion arrived at by my learned colleagues, and in the judgment of my brother Banerji. It is the more satisfactory that we have been able to arrive at this conclusion, because, if it were otherwise, the respondent Sangari would be benefiting by the failure to comply with the provisions of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act. I also concur in the order proposed.

* [The order of the Court is:—

That the appeal should be allowed. The respondent, Jhamman, dismissed from the suit and appeal with costs, if any, incurred by him.

That the judgment and decree of the lower Court being set aside on the preliminary point, the record is remanded under s. 562 to the lower Court with directions to readmit the appeal on its file of pending appeals and to dispose of it according to law. Costs here and hitherto to follow the event.]

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. MANNU.† [13th July, 1897.]

Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 172, 161, 162, 167.—Police diaries—What Police diaries should contain—Statements recorded under s. 161, of the Criminal Procedure Code—Whether such statements may form part of the special diary—Act No. 1 of 1872 (Indian Evidence Act), ss. 39, 145, and 161.

A Sessions Judge, although he has power in any particular case which is before him to send for the Police diaries connected with the case, if he thinks it necessary to peruse them, has no authority to issue a general order that in every case committed for trial to the Court of Session, and in every criminal appeal, the Police diaries shall be submitted to the Court simultaneously with the Magistrate's record of the case. Such an order is illegal.

In no case is an accused person entitled as of right to a copy of any statement recorded by a Police officer in the special diary prepared under the authority of s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The special diary may be used by the Court to assist it in the inquiry or trial by suggesting means of further elucidating points which need clearing up and which are material for the purpose of doing justice between the Crown and the accused; but entries in the special diary cannot by themselves be taken as evidence of any date, fact or statement therein contained.

The special diary may also be used by the Court for the purpose of contradicting the police officer who made it, and the special diary may be used by the Police officer who made it, and by no witness other than such officer, for the purpose of refreshing his memory.

If the special diary is used by the Court to contradict the Police officer who made it, or by the Police officer who made it to refresh his memory, the accused person or his agent has a right to see that portion of the diary which has been referred to for either of these purposes, that is to say, the accused person or his agent is entitled to see the particular entry which has been referred to and so much of the diary as in the opinion of the Court is necessary in that particular matter to the full understanding of the particular entry so used, but no more.

† Criminal Appeal, No. 508 of 1897.

So held by the Full Bench.

[391] Per EDGE, O.J., KNOX, BLAIR and BURKITT, JJ.—A Police officer investigating a case may lawfully reduce into writing in the special diary the full and unabridged statement made to him by a person whom he is examining or has examined under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and if he does so, his record of such statement is part of the special diary and is just as much privileged as any other entry in the diary.

All statements made under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to a Police officer and reduced into writing by him should be reduced into writing in the special diary and not elsewhere.

Per BANERJI, J., and AIKMAN, J. Statements recorded under s. 161 of Code of Criminal Procedure by a Police officer making an investigation were not intended by the Legislature to be entered in the special diary, and if they are so entered do not form an integral part of the diary and are not privileged, but the accused person or his agent is entitled to see them.

A mere summary, however, of facts ascertained by an investigating officer from persons examined by him, not being a report of their actual statements, may properly find a place in the special diary.

The following cases were referred to.—The Empress v. Kali Churn Chunari (1); Kallu v. The Queen-Empress (2); Queen-Empress v. Nasir-ud-din (3); *Queen-Empress v. JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—This case raises not only the question as to whether the appellant was or was not guilty of the offence of which he was convicted, but important questions as to the use which may or may not legally be made of diaries made by Police officers under s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and as to what those diaries may contain. I propose first to consider the latter questions.

Section 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is as follows:—"Every Police officer making an investigation under this chapter shall day by day enter his proceedings in the investigation in a diary, setting forth the time at which the information reached him, the time at which he began and closed his investigation, the place or places visited by him, and a statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation."

"Any Criminal Court may send for the Police diaries of a case under inquiry or trial in such court, and may use such diaries, not as evidence in the case, but to aid it in such inquiry or trial. Neither the accused nor his agents shall be entitled to call for such diaries, nor shall he or they be entitled to see them merely because they are referred to by the Court; but if they are used by the Police officer who made them to refresh his memory, or if [393] the Court uses them for the purpose of contradicting such Police officer, the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, s. 161 or s. 145, as the case may be, shall apply."

It is within the experience of every Judge of this Court that much misconception exists in these Provinces as to the use which can be made by a Court or by an accused person or his agents of the diaries which are kept by Police officers under s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and which in these Provinces are known as special diaries. It is within our judicial knowledge that some Sessions Judges and some Magistrates have decided criminal cases by conviction or by acquittal of the accused on statements which are found in the special diary relating to the case, and have done so without having asked the Police officer who made the special diary or any witness in the case one word as to the truth of these statements, and consequently without having afforded to the prosecution or the accused, as the case was, any opportunity of explaining or of contradicting such statements. Such a use of a special diary by a Court is entirely illegal. I have met with cases which were decided exclusively upon the entries contained in special diaries and not upon any evidence which was before the Court. A Criminal Court is entitled to "send for the Police diaries of a case under inquiry or trial before it, and may use such diaries, not as evidence in the case, but to aid it in such inquiry or trial." Such Criminal Court may permit the Police officer who made the special diary to look at it for the purpose of refreshing his memory or may use the special diary for the purpose of contradicting such Police officer. Where the Police officer who made the special diary is allowed to refresh his memory and does look at an entry in the diary for the purpose of refreshing his memory, the provisions of s. 161 of the Indian [394] Evidence Act, 1872, apply, and the accused or his agent is entitled to see such entry in the special diary and to cross-examine such Police officer thereupon. There is no provision in s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enabling any person other than the Police officer who made the special diary to refresh his memory by looking at the special diary, and the necessary implication is that a special diary cannot be used to enable any witness other than the Police officer who made the special diary to refresh his memory by looking at it. This is in truth a general principle of law. The Criminal Court, but not an accused person or his agent, unless the Police officer has been allowed to look at the diary in order to refresh his memory, can use the special diary for the purpose of contradicting the Police officer who made it, but before doing so the Court must comply with the specific enactment of s. 145 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, and call the attention of the Police officer to such parts of the special diary as are to be used for the purpose of contradicting him, otherwise such a use of the special diary would be illegal. There is no provision in s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enabling the Court, the prosecution or the accused to use the special diary for the purpose of contradicting any witness other than the Police officer who made it, and the necessary implication is that the special diary cannot be used to contradict any witness other than the Police officer who made it. S. 145 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, does not either extend or control the provisions of s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is only if the Court uses the special diary for the purpose of contradicting the Police officer who made it that s. 145 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, applies, and in such case it applies for that purpose only, and not for the purpose of enabling the Court or a party to contradict any other witness in the case, or to show it or any part of its contents to any other [395] witness. No reading of s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure consistent with the rules of construction and a knowledge of the English language is possible by which the special diary is to be used to contradict any person except the Police officer who made it. It is not enacted in s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by reference to s. 145 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, or otherwise that if the special diary is used by the Court to contradict the Police officer who made it, it may thereupon or thereafter be used to contradict any other witness in the case.

The power of the Criminal Court to use the special diary is not limited to the use of it for the purpose of enabling the Police officer who made it to refresh his memory or for the purpose of contradicting him. The Court may also use the special diary not as evidence of any date, fact or statement referred to in it, but as containing indications of sources and lines of inquiry and as suggesting the names of persons whose evidence may be material for the purpose of doing justice between the Crown and the accused. Should the Court consider that any date, fact or statement referred to in the special diary is or may be material, it cannot legally accept the special diary as evidence, in any sense, of such date, fact or statement, and must in law, before allowing any date, fact or statement referred to in the special diary to influence its mind, have such date, fact or statement established by legal evidence. It is the Court which is entitled to use the special diary for the purpose of seeking for sources and lines of inquiry and for the names of persons who may be in a position to give material evidence. Neither the accused nor his agent is entitled under s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to see the special diary for any purpose unless it has been used by the Court for enabling the Police officer who made it to refresh his memory or for the purpose of contradicting him.

[396] It has, however, been contended before us here, and there is authority for the contention, that if the special diary contains any statement made by any person who was examined by the Police officer who was making, under chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, an investigation in the case, the privilege provided for the special diary by s. 172 of that Code is gone, and that the accused or his agent is entitled to see the entry of such statement in the special diary. That is, in my opinion, an unsound proposition. It is unsound as being contrary to the express enactment of s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it is unsound as being contrary to public policy. Section 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides for the two events, on the happening of either of which the accused or his agent is entitled to see the special diary: and it enacts that, except on the happening of one of those events, "neither the accused nor his agents shall be entitled to call for such diaries, nor shall he or they be entitled to see them merely because they are referred to by the Court." In my opinion the plain meaning of s. 172 is that the special diary, no matter what it may contain, is absolutely privileged, unless it is used to enable the Police officer who made it to refresh his memory or is used for the purpose of contradicting him. In face of the fact that the Legislature has thought it right to enact that there shall be two exceptions to the privilege accorded to the special diary, I cannot as a lawyer read a third exception into the section, and I have no power to legislate. The privilege attaching to the special diary is a privilege conferred upon the special diary, not by Judges, but by the Legislature, and must be maintained by Courts of justice in its integrity whether or not Judges consider that it is reasonable that to the special diary and its contents should be accorded such privilege. It is a privilege which cannot depend upon the question as to whether the Police officer who made the special diary did or did not [397] insert in the special diary extraneous matter, nor can it depend upon the question as to whether or not the Police officer made the special diary in the particular form which is approved of by the Court.

It must not be assumed from what I have said that I consider that it is unreasonable that the special diary and its contents should be privileged from inspection by an accused person or his agent. In fact I consider that there are sound reasons of public policy why the fullest protection from inspection by any one other than the Judge or the Magistrate before whom the case is should be accorded to the special diary, and to everything which is contained in it. It is of vital interest to the public that the commission of crimes should be repressed, and that those who commit criminal offences should be detected and should be brought to justice. It is also of vital interest to the public that innocent persons should not be convicted. Any one of the public may be the victim of a crime, or may be unjustly charged with the commission of a crime. The early stages of the investigation which follows on the commission of a crime must necessarily in the vast majority of cases be left to the Police, and until the honesty, the capacity, the discretion and the judgment of the Police can be thoroughly trusted, it is necessary for the protection of the public against criminals, for the vindication of the law, and for the protection of those who are charged with having committed a criminal offence that the Magistrate or Judge before whom the case is for investigation or for trial should have the means of ascertaining what was the information, true, false, or misleading, which was obtained from day to day by the Police officer who was investigating the case, and what were the lines of investigation upon which such Police officer acted. A properly kept special diary would afford such information, and such information would enable the Magistrate or Judge to determine whether persons referred to in the special diary, [398] but not sent up as witnesses by the Police, should be summoned to give evidence in the interests of the prosecution or of the accused. It must be always remembered that it is the duty of the Magistrate or of the Judge before whom a criminal case is, to ascertain if possible on which side the truth is, and to decide accordingly. It must happen that a Police officer, who is investigating a criminal case, receives some true information, some false information, and some misleading information, and it must happen that such Police officer forms, no doubt sometimes prematurely, a theory about the case, to which having committed himself he probably adheres. An ordinary knowledge of the infirmities of human nature and a knowledge of what does in fact take place in some cases teach us that in many cases the inclination of a Police officer, who in his early investigation of a criminal case has committed himself honestly or dishonestly to a theory as to the case, is to work the case so as to support that theory, whether the vindication of justice is to be the result or not. It is consequently essential that the Magistrate or the Judge, who has to hold the scales of justice evenly between the Crown and the accused, should have some means of ascertaining what was the information obtained by the Police officer each day in the course of the investigation and what were the lines upon which the investigation proceeded. It is also necessary in the interests of the public that Magistrates of Districts and District Superintendents of Police should have some means of informing themselves of the proceedings of the Police within their districts in the investigation of crimes and of ascertaining what information, whether derived from personal observation or from statements made to the Police officer making an investigation under chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure, such Police officer has obtained. The Legislature of India has done all that can be done by way of enactment to provide such a means and source of information for the [399] Magistrate and the Judge, and the Local Government of these Provinces and of Oudh, by requiring that a counterpart of the special diary for each day shall each day be sent to the Magistrate of the District, has done all that it can do to safeguard the daily entries in the special diary from being subsequently suppressed or from being tampered with. But I regret to say that some Sessions Judges by their procedure and by their misunderstanding of the use which may legally be made of special diaries have done much to frustrate the intention of the Legislature, and unintentionally to encourage the Police to evade the law and to keep out of the special diaries, and to suppress information which, rightly or wrongly, the Police officer considers to be opposed to the theory which he has adopted and upon which he has conducted his investigation. Where statements made under s. 161 of the Code to a Police officer are reduced into writing elsewhere than in the special diary, they are liable to be suppressed or to be tampered with. Quite recently, and since the argument in this case was concluded, an appeal against a conviction came before me in a case in which a statement made under s. 161 to a Police officer and reduced into writing by him, but not in the special diary, was subsequently tampered with by inserting in it false matter incriminating a man who was subsequently put upon his trial and was properly acquitted. For the results which ensue, and which are to be seen in miscarriages of justice, the Police are not in my opinion solely to blame. The result is that true cases fail and, I fear, false cases sometimes succeed. If the special diary or any thing which it contains is to be subject to the inspection of an accused person or of his agent, it is hopeless to expect that the Police officer making the investigation will insert in it information obtained by him, but which, rightly or wrongly, although honestly, he believes to be injurious to the case for the prosecution, or to be misleading or to be false. Further, so long as [400] Magistrates and Judges allow their minds to be influenced by, and decide cases upon, information contained in special diaries which has not been established by legal evidence and has not been tested and sifted by the examination of witnesses, it is hopeless to expect that Police officers will resist the temptation to keep out of the special diaries information which, if inserted in them, would, in the opinion of such Police officer, be likely to mislead the Magistrate or the Judge. Such information may be suppressed with the honest intention of procuring the conviction of an accused person whom the Police officer believes to be guilty, or it may be suppressed with the dishonest intention of shielding a guilty person or of procuring the conviction of an innocent person. The considerations to which I have referred have led me to the conclusion that it is a matter of public policy that the limited privilege and protection from inspection which the Legislature has accorded to special diaries should not be curtailed or encroached upon, and that all statements made under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to a Police officer and reduced into writing by him should be reduced into writing in the special diary and not elsewhere.

As I understand it, the view which has been entertained by some Judges elsewhere is that a Police officer who is investigating a criminal case has no power to obtain from any person any statement relating to the commission of the offence except under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and that if such Police officer does obtain any such statement and voluntarily reduces it into writing, the accused or his agent is entitled to see the writing whether it be contained in or forms part of the special diary or not. Indeed the contention for the appellant in this case went further. It was contended that if such Police officer inserted in the special diary in any guise even a mere summary of what a person examined by him had stated the accused or his agent was entitled to see such summary. It [401] was frankly admitted that, if that contention was well-founded and the privilege of special diaries was to be maintained, all allusion to persons from whom the Police officer had received information should be confined to a mere statement that the Police officer had examined, for example, A, B, C, and D, or possibly should be confined to a mere statement, for example, that the Police officer had examined A, B, C and D, that it appeared that X had murdered Y. Neither of such entries would contain any information of any practical use to the Magistrate or the Judge, and the latter of such statements, although it might express the honest conclusion of the Police officer might be entirely misleading. It frequently happens that a Police officer examines 40, 50 or more persons in the course of an investigation: some, indeed many, of such persons may have no evidence to give, others may be in a position to give material evidence, but may deny all knowledge of what occurred, others may be able to speak merely from hearsay, others may have been eye-witnesses and may speak the truth, whilst others may wilfully give false or misleading information. A mere schedule of the names and addresses of the persons whom the Police officer had examined could not afford to the Magistrate or to the Judge the slightest indication as to which of the above categories included the several persons examined by the Police officer, and in most cases it would be impracticable and a mere waste of public time for the Magistrate or the Judge to summon and examine all the persons whose names were included in the schedule. An entry that the Police officer had examined A, B, C, D, and E, and that it appeared that X had murdered Y might be true as expressing the opinion of the Police officer, but it would afford no indication of the reason why, for example, C, D, and E, had not been sent up as witnesses, although the fact might be that C had given private information on condition that his name should not be disclosed as that of an informer, that D knew absolutely nothing about the matter, and that E had [402] made a palpably false statement. It is obvious to my mind that a special diary to be of any practical use to a Magistrate or a Judge must contain much more information as to what was stated by the persons who were examined by the Police officer, and if it is to contain further information, I cannot conceive any good reason why it should not contain a full reproduction of the statements made by the persons examined.

A Police officer is not compelled to reduce to writing any statement made to him by a person whom he examines: he is, however, compelled to insert in the privileged special diary "a statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation." It would be no evasion of the law as enacted by the Legislature for such Police officer to enter in the following manner in the special diary the statements made to him by persons whom he had examined: "On the 12th of August I examined A, B, C, D, and E. The following is a statement of the circumstances ascertained through my investigation: A, at 10 o'clock A.M., on August 11th saw X kill Y with an axe. B, when returning from his paddy-field to the village at 9-45 A.M. the same day, heard X using threatening language to Y. X admitted to C at 11 A.M. the same day that he had killed Y on account of a dispute as to a field. X had borrowed the axe from D at 7 o'clock that morning to cut wood. E states that he saw A murder Y at 9 o'clock on the evening of the 10th of August. That statement is false; it can be proved that E was in custody 20 miles away on the 9th and 10th, and was not released until the morning of the 11th of August." The skeleton entry which I have given as an illustration could be enlarged by the Police officer so as to give the statements of A, B, C, D, and E in full, and still be merely "a statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation," and could in no possible view of the law be treated as an evasion of the law, such a statement would in my opinion be in compliance [403] with s. 172. What possible difference in principle can there be between a statement so made and a statement giving in direct narrative form what A, B, C, D, and E had said respectively in answer to the inquiries of the Police officer? I can see none.

S. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is not the only section in that Code which, carefully read, shows that the special diary should contain at least a precis or a summary of the statements made to the Police officer making an investigation in a criminal case. The Police are not permitted to detain an accused person in custody longer than 24 hours. It is by s. 167 of the Code of Criminal Procedure enacted that "whenever it appears that any investigation under this chapter cannot be completed within the period of 24 hours fixed by s. 61, and there are grounds for believing that the accusation is well-grounded, the officer in charge of the Police station shall forthwith transmit to the nearest Magistrate a copy of the entries in the diary hereinafter prescribed relating to the case, and shall at the same time forward the accused to such Magistrate." "The Magistrate to whom an accused person is forwarded under this section may, whether he has or has not jurisdiction to try the case, from time to time, authorize the detention of the accused in such custody as such Magistrate thinks fit for a term not exceeding fifteen days. If he has not jurisdiction to try the case or commit it for trial, and considers further detention unnecessary, he may order the accused to be forwarded to a Magistrate having such jurisdiction." "A Magistrate authorizing under this section detention in the custody of the Police shall record his reasons for so doing." "If such order be given by a Magistrate other than the District Magistrate or Sub-Divisional Magistrate, he shall forward a copy of his order, with his reasons for making it, to the Magistrate to whom he is immediately subordinate."

[404] If the entries in the special diary are not to contain the statements or even summaries of the statements of the persons who have been examined by the Police officer making the investigation, what information will "a copy of the entries in the diary" afford to the Magistrate upon which he can decide whether or not he should authorize the detention of the accused person in custody, or upon which he could form an opinion as to whether or not further detention was unnecessary. It is upon these entries in the special diary that the Magistrate is to decide and to form his opinion as to whether or not the accused person is to be detained in custody. There is not one word in s. 167 to suggest that any statement reduced into writing elsewhere than in the special diary is to be forwarded to the Magistrate.

If the special diary is to be of any practical use in aiding a Magistrate or Criminal Court in a criminal inquiry or trial, or is to be of any use in enabling a Magistrate to decide, under s. 167 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, as to whether an accused person should or should not be detained in custody, the special diary must contain at least a summary of the statements made by the persons who had been examined under s. 161 of the Code by the Police officer making the investigation. Few people would, I imagine, suggest that a mere summary of a person's statement could be regarded by a Magistrate or by a Judge as affording as satisfactory or as complete a source of information as the unabridged statement of such person would afford. The summary would merely represent what the Police officer considered to be the effect of the person's statement to him. The unabridged statement, if correctly taken down, would give what the person making the statement had in fact said. Common sense suggests that when the Legislature enacted in s. 172 that the special diary might be used by a Magistrate or by a Judge in an inquiry [405] or in a trial in a criminal case, and enacted in s. 167 that "a copy of the entries" in the special diary should be sent to the Magistrate who had to decide whether or not an accused person should be detained in custody, the Legislature intended that the information to be afforded by the special diary should be as complete as possible, so far as the purposes for which the special diary might be lawfully used were concerned. And this, in my opinion, compels the conclusion that the Police officer who is making an investigation under Chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure may lawfully reduce to writing in the special diary the full and unabridged statement made to him by a person whom he is examining or has examined under s. 161 of the Code. A consideration of s. 172 of the Code, in my opinion, compels the conclusion that the special diary, including every entry in it, is absolutely privileged from inspection by an accused person or his agent unless the special diary is used by the Police officer who made it to refresh his memory, or is used by the Court to contradict the Police officer who made the special diary. A consideration of the principles of public policy leads me to the same conclusion. From s. 39 of the Indian Evidence Act, 1872, may be inferred how much—and how much only—of the special diary may be seen by an accused person or his agent when the special diary is used to refresh his memory by the Police officer who made it or is used by the Court to contradict such officer. In such case the accused person or his agent is in law entitled to see only the particular entry used and so much of the special diary as is in the opinion of the Court necessary in that particular matter to the full understanding of the particular entry so used, and no more. In such cases the Court must be careful to see that the discretion entrusted to it in deciding what may or may not be seen by the accused or his agent is not abused, remembering that the [406] discretion is to be a judicial discretion, and is not to be influenced by a mere arbitrary fancy.

In no case is an accused person or his agent entitled, in my opinion, to a copy of the special diary or of any part of it. The special diary is, except in the two events to which I have referred, privileged from inspection by an accused person and his agent, and on the happening of one of those events the sole right conceded by the Legislature to an accused person and his agent is the limited right of inspection which I have mentioned.

The Legislature must have had some object in view in according to special diaries a protection, except in two events, from inspection by an accused person or his agent. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature that such object should be obtained only when it should appear to the Magistrate or to the Judge concerned with the particular case that the Police officer had kept his special diary in the manner approved of for the time being by such Magistrate or Judge, and should be defeated if the special diary happened to have been kept in a manner which did not meet with the approval of the particular Magistrate or Judge. One main object of all legislation is to ensure uniformity in the law and its application, and not to ensure the confusion which would result from leaving judicial officers a free hand to follow the bent of their individual fancies as to what the law ought to be or ought not to be. It appears to me that when Judges attempt to construe s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and decide that a statement made under s. 161 of that Code to a Police officer and reduced by him into writing in the special diary is not, and is not to be deemed to be part of the special diary, it is the duty of such Judges to explain precisely and clearly how a Police officer making an investigation under Chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure is to comply with the requirements of s. 172, and to make his special diary, so [407] that it may be in accordance with the provisions of s. 172, and that it may be of any practical use to a Magistrate under s. 167 or to a Court under s. 172 of the Code, and still maintain the privilege which is accorded to it by the Legislature and particularly to explain in what form the "statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation" is to be entered, and to what extent, if at all, and in what form, such "statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation" may include statements made to him under s. 161. I maintain without hesitation that no such explanation can be given which will be consistent with a decision according to which a statement made under s. 161 to the Police officers and reduced into writing in the special diary is not to be deemed to be part of the diary. When Judges have to construe an Act of the Legislature, it is their duty so to construe it, if it be possible, as to make the provisions of the Act consistent with each other, to give effect, not to their own ideas as to what ought to be the law, but to the expressed intention of the Legislature, and not to construe it, as in this case, so as to make the protection accorded by the Legislature to special diaries depend upon the capacity, capability, ignorance or negligence of a Police officer or upon the idiosyncracies of a Magistrate or a Judge. It is the duty of Judges when construing an Act of the Legislature to attempt to ascertain what was the intention of the Legislature, and to give effect to it, and not to seek for some pretext for defeating an intention of the Legislature which does not meet with their approval.

Those who recognise the self-evident truth of the proposition that the intention of the Legislature was that it is only on the happening of one or other of the two events especially provided for in s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure that the special diary or any part of it should be open to the inspection of an accused person or of his agent, [408] but are desirous, whatever may have been the intention of the Legislature, that accused persons and their agents should have inspection of statements made under s. 161 of the Code to a Police officer and reduced by him into writing in the special diary are forced to adopt the contention that such a statement does not form part of the special diary, although it happens to be entered in it. There are, no doubt, some decisions to support that contention; but those decisions are not binding upon this Bench, and it was, in fact, partly in consequence of one of those decisions that this case was referred to the Full Bench, not to decide whether this Full Bench is bound by it (it could not be suggested that it is), but to ascertain how far, if at all, that decision was a correct exposition of the law to be followed in these Provinces. It has not been pointed out to us that in any of the decisions to which I am referring, and which we are invited to follow because they were decisions of High Courts, any of the questions which it is necessary to consider to enable us to arrive at a correct construction of s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure and to ascertain what was the intention of the Legislature were considered. In the Indian Law Reports, 8 Calcutta, there are two conflicting decisions bearing on this subject, the earliest of which, in my opinion, is correct and is consistent with sound principles, that decision was ignored and the other decision in that volume was followed in the Calcutta Court. On the other hand, amongst others, the able, weighty and instructive Judgment of Sir Meredyth Plowden and Mr. Justice Roe in Kallu and others v. Queen-Empress, (1) deserves careful consideration. A decision is valuable or the reverse in proportion to the consideration which was given to the questions involved in it, and to the reasons expressed for the conclusion arrived at by the Judge or Judges who were parties to it. The practical question is—has the Legislature, which has enacted that special diaries shall [409] be kept and has accorded to those diaries limited protection for inspection by an accused person or his agent, anywhere enacted that when a Police officer making an investigation under Chapter XIV of the Code of Criminal Procedure voluntarily—there is no compulsion—reduces into writing under s. 161 of that Code, a statement made to him, he shall not make such reduction into writing in the special diary or shall make it elsewhere? Unless the Legislature has so enacted, there is no foundation in law for the proposition that such a statement when entered in the special diary is not part of the special diary or must not be treated as part of the special diary. In fact, the Legislature has nowhere enacted that any statement made to such Police officer under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shall not be reduced into writing in the special diary, or when reduced into writing shall not be or be deemed to be part of the special diary. On the contrary, the Legislature has in my opinion plainly indicated by s. 167 and s. 172 of that Code that such statement if material, or so much of it as is material, shall appear in the special diary, and shall form part of it. The Legislature has—and I think wisely—not conferred upon Judges power to make rules for the making of special diaries, or as to what is and is not to be entered in them or to form part of them. Judges have no power to legislate, except the quasi-Legislative power of making rules in certain cases; and it appears to me that were we to decide that statements made to Police officers under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure shall not be entered in the special diaries, or if entered in them shall not be deemed to be parts of the special diaries, we should be attempting to usurp the functions of the Legislature, and therein would be forgetting our duties as Judges—duties which it appears to me are better understood on the Bench in England than they are here.

It was contended by Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji that "natural justice" requires that when a Police officer reduces, [410] under s. 161 of the Code, into writing the statement of any person, the accused should be allowed to see the statement so taken down. No doubt it would be convenient for an accused person to be put in possession of all the information as to the case which a Police officer had obtained. It would be particularly convenient and useful, for example, that an accused person should know beforehand what line of defence he had better adopt, and whether or not it would be reasonably safe to try on a false alibi, without incurring the risk of the prosecution being in a position to call and calling rebutting evidence. An accused person can in England obtain a copy of any deposition taken in his case before a Magistrate; an accused person has the same privilege here. In England, if the prosecution intends to call at a trial at Assizes or at Quarter Sessions as a witness to facts in support of the direct case for the prosecution, a person who has not been called before the committing Magistrate, it is the customary, but not the obligatory, practice for the prosecuting solicitor to give to the accused or to his solicitor a short summary of what such person is expected to depose to, but no such practice existed with regard to rebutting evidence, although the prosecution might be prepared with such rebutting evidence before the trial. In my opinion Her Majesty's Judges in England are fully as anxious as are Her Majesty's Judges in India that accused persons should have a fair trial and should be afforded every legitimate opportunity for, and means of, defending themselves; but I never heard it suggested in England that the prosecution should prepare the brief for the defence, or should supply the defence with a copy, or a summary, of the evidence of a person from whom the Police had obtained information which was considered to be unreliable or immaterial and which consequently the prosecution did not propose to put before the Court, or should supply the defence with any information which had been obtained for the purpose of proving, if the necessity should [411] arise, a rebutting case. I confess that I regard with extreme suspicion an argument based on "natural justice." When "natural justice" is appealed to in support of an argument, I generally find that the argument cannot be supported, and that the "natural justice" argument is an argument which is employed to divert a Judge's attention from the true principles to be applied, and to lead him into following some bent or bias of his own mind. Men hold different opinions as to what is natural justice. Many communists honestly believe that "natural justice" requires that there should be an equal division of all personal property amongst the people ; other people honestly believe that the personal property which a man by his own brains and exertion has acquired he should be allowed to keep for his own enjoyment.

Probably there is no Sessions Judge in these Provinces who, as a Magistrate, was observant of what takes place at a police investigation who will not recognise the truth of the description which is contained in the following passage which I quote from a judgment which was delivered in The Queen-Empress v. Nasir-ud-din (1), by my brother Knox, and was concurred in by my brother Burkitt. The passage is as follows :—" Still more extraordinary is a permission given before the case came on for trial by which the accused were granted copies of statements recorded by the Police during the investigation. Such statements are recorded by Police officers in the most haphazard manner. Officers conducting an investigation not unnaturally record what seems in their opinion material to the case at that stage, and omit many matters equally material, and, it may be, of supreme importance as the case develops. Besides that, in most cases they are not experts of what is and what is not evidence. The statements are recorded often hurriedly in the midst of a crowd and confusion, subject to frequent interruption and suggestions from by-standers. Over and [412] above all, they cannot be in any sense termed depositions, for they are not prepared in the way of a deposition, they are not read over to, nor are they signed by, the deponents. There is no guarantee that they do not contain much more or much less than what the witness has said. The law has safeguarded the use of them, and it never can have been the intention of the Legislature that, as in this case, copies of them should have been without question and as a matter of course made over to the accused or their counsel." And yet it is of such statements, reduced into writing under such circumstances, that it is contended that the accused and his agent should have inspection and should have copies. One can easily understand how such copies would be paraded before a jury as having been furnished by the prosecution as correct representations of what witnesses had said to the Police officer, and what might be the effect on the jury. Most Sessions Judges would be able to understand the position ; but it may be doubted whether the ordinary jurors in these Provinces would. Whether more confidence can be reposed in jurors elsewhere I am not in a position to say.

Before concluding this judgment I must again point out that it is the absolute duty of Judges and Magistrates to entirely disregard all statements and entries in special diaries as being in any sense legal evidence for any purpose, except for the one solitary purpose of contradicting the Police officer who made the special diary when they do afford such a contradiction ; and even in that case they are not evidence of anything except that such Police officer made the particular entry which is at variance with his subsequently given evidence ; they are not evidence that what is stated in the entry was true or correctly represents what was said or done.

As the Courts have, owing to the illegal use by some Magistrates and Sessions Judges of special diaries, been deprived to some extent in many cases of the valuable assistance which it was intended by the Legislature that a special diary should [413] afford to competent Magistrates or to competent Judges in enabling them to obtain clues to evidence which is not before them, and which it is desirable in the interests of justice should be obtained and recorded, it is advisable to say that Magistrates and Sessions Judges who in the future abuse their right to have the special diaries before them, or who make an illegal use of the special diaries, will, in these Provinces, be reported to the Local Government as persons who are unfit to hold responsible judicial posts. Magistrates and Sessions Judges should remember that they hold responsible offices of great trust under the Government, that they receive their salaries as the consideration for the honest performance of the duties imposed upon them, and that their appointments to such offices do not confer upon them a right to apply as law that which has no other basis than their own fancy as to what the law ought to be. If the conscience of a Magistrate or of a Judge forbids him to apply the law as it is or to make himself to the best of his ability acquainted with the law or procedure to be applied in a case before him, that same conscience should suggest to him that he should vacate his office and seek a livelihood in some other walk of life. I have been compelled to make these observations by my recollection of the illegal procedure of more than one Sessions Judge.

As to the merits of the appeal before us, I am of opinion that there is a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the appellant. I would allow the appeal, and acquitting the appellant direct that the appellant be at once discharged.

On behalf of the Court I must express to Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji our thanks for the very able argument which he has addressed to us on behalf of the appellant, he having appeared on behalf of the appellant at the request of the Court.

BLAIR, J.—I entirely concur in the order proposed by the Chief Justice and have nothing to add to the conclusions upon the matters referred to us at which he has arrived, or to the [414] reasoning by which those conclusions are supported. But I desire to add a word to prevent possible misconstruction in the future. It has been shown, I think, conclusively by the judgment of the Chief Justice that statements taken down under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure are within the true intent and meaning of s. 172 of the same Act included in the category of the matters which an investigating Police officer should under the provisions of that section insert in the diary. But it must not be inferred that in my opinion such latter section contains an exhaustive list of the matters which may with propriety be so entered. There is much which may tend to the furtherance of the objects for which the diary has been instituted which would not fall within the language of that section, but which may with great advantage be entered in the diary, and when so entered would in my judgment be within the exemption from exposure extended to the diary by law. I know no canon of construction which justifies a narrower and more restrictive interpretation of s. 172, nor am I aware of any authority by which a document protected from disclosure for reasons of public policy, can be divested of such protection simply because it may contain redundant or irrelevant matter.

KNOX, J.—I have read and carefully considered the judgment just delivered by the learned Chief Justice. I have only to say that I concur fully in every word that is laid down therein and in the reason by which those results have been arrived at.

The views just expressed concerning the use of Police diaries are substantially the views that I have held for years past, and I have heard nothing in the very careful and able argument of this case addressed to us by Mr. D. Banerji, which leads me to hold otherwise now. I have also read what my brother Burkitt has written, and agree with what he is about to say.

I would allow the appeal.

[415] BURKITT, J.—I fully concur in the exhaustive exposition of the law as to the preparation of Police special diaries and their protection from inspection which has just been pronounced by the learned Chief Justice. I have nothing to add to what has been so clearly laid down in that judgment. All I desire to say respecting it is that to me there is nothing new in the principles and the rules of law therein enunciated. For more than thirty years, as a Subordinate Magistrate, a Magistrate of a district, and a Sessions Judge successively, in these Provinces and latterly as a Judge of the final Court of appeal in another Province, and now as a Judge of this High Court, I have always understood the law as to special diaries to be that which it has now been declared to be by the learned Chief Justice, and I invariably acted upon that view. Indeed until quite recently I did not imagine that the matter was one as to which, in these Provinces at least, there was any diversity of opinion.

There is one matter not touched on in the judgment as to which I desire to say a few words. The remarks I am about to make have the concurrence of all the members of this Bench. It has come to my notice, and to that of other members of the Bench, that some Sessions Judges in these Provinces have taken it upon themselves to issue a general order directing the Police diaries in every case committed for trial to the Court of Session and of every criminal appeal to be transmitted to them simultaneously with the Magistrate's records of the cases. It is hardly necessary for me to point out that such an order is illegal. The law nowhere empowers a Sessions Judge to issue such a general order. It authorizes him to send for the diaries of a case under trial before him, if he thinks it necessary in that case to peruse the diaries; but the order must be one ad hoc, confined to a case actually pending before the Sessions Judge, and not a general order as to all cases. Such a general order is not warranted by [416] law, and the Police authorities would be justified in refusing to obey it.

As to the appeal in which this reference has arisen, I would concur in acquitting and in directing the release of the appellant.

AIKMAN, J.—I have had the privilege of reading the able and exhaustive judgment of the learned Chief Justice in this case.

I entirely concur in his remarks regarding the misuse which is too often made of Police diaries by Courts. I also agree in the opinion he has expressed in regard to the extent to which accused persons or their agents are entitled to have recourse to Police diaries which have been used by a Police officer to refresh his memory, or by a Court for the purpose of contradicting the Police officer. I also agree in thinking that neither the accused nor his agents are entitled as of right to have copies of statements of witnesses which have been recorded by the Police.

The main question, however, which was discussed at the bar when this appeal was argued was whether the accused or his agents are entitled to see statements, recorded by the Police, of witnesses who are called for the prosecution.

That this is a question of no small difficulty is evident from the contradictory answers which have been given to it by learned Judges who have considered it. As instances of these contradictory views I may refer to the judgment of Trevelyan and Rampini, JJ., in the case Sheru Sha v. The Queen-Empress (1) and the judgment of Sir Meredyth Plowden in the case of Kallu v. Queen-Empress (2).

I must admit that I have been impressed with much of the reasoning of the learned Chief Justice and of Sir Meredyth Plowden in the case just mentioned. But after a long and anxious consideration I find myself compelled to adhere to the opinion at which, in concurrence with Mr. Justice Blennerhassett, I arrived in the case Queen-Empress v. Rudr Sing (3), in which we held that an accused person is entitled to see previous statements of witnesses [417] called to give evidence against him which have been recorded by the Police in the course of the investigation. Following the Calcutta case quoted above, we held that it made no difference to the accused's right whether the statements were recorded separately from the diary, or were included in it.

From the fact that learned Judges have arrived at diametrically opposite conclusions on the question at issue, it must, I think, be admitted that the intention of the Legislature has not been so clearly expressed as to put the matter beyond doubt. This being so, I think it is open to a Judge to consider whether a priori there is any reason why the Legislature should make these statements privileged.

"The object of a trial in every case" said Mr. Justice Nanabhai Haridas in the case Reg. v. Uttamchand Kapurchand (4) "is to ascertain the truth in respect of the charge made. For this purpose, it is necessary that the Court should be in a position to estimate at its true worth the evidence given by each witness, and nothing that is calculated to assist it in doing so ought to be excluded, unless for reasons of public policy, the law expressly requires its exclusion."

Now, an accused is entitled to show the Court, if he can, that the witnesses who are giving evidence against him are unworthy of credit. One of the ways in which the law allows the credit of a witness to be impeached is "by proof of former statements inconsistent with any part of his evidence which is liable to be contradicted" [vide s. 155 (3) of the Evidence Act]. It requires no argument to show that if a witness who is giving evidence against an accused person is proved to have made statements differing materially from the evidence he gives in Court, the value of his testimony is seriously impaired, for it is clear that either he or his memory is not to be trusted. It appears to me, then, to be a priori improbable that the Legislature would throw any obstacle in the way of an accused person showing that a witness who is called for the prosecution, has previously told a materially different story.

[418] Suppose the following case, which is not an exaggerated instance of the discrepancies sometimes found between evidence given in Court and statements made to the Police. A prisoner named Ram Bakhsh, is on his trial for murder. The brother of the deceased is called as a witness for the prosecution and deposes that in the early morning, as he was returning from watching his fields to the house in which he and his brother lived, he saw the prisoner rush out of the house, and when he entered it found his brother lying on his bed with his throat cut. In the possession of the Police is a statement of this witness, recorded at the outset of the investigation to the following effect:—"I was watching my field in the early morning when my nephew came running from the village crying, and told me his father (my brother) had been murdered. I at once went home and found my brother lying on his bed with his throat cut. I suspect Ram Bakhsh of having committed the murder, as my brother and he had a quarrel two days previously." If there is in the possession of the prosecution or of the Police, which comes to the same thing, such a statement, is there any reason why it should be withheld from the accused or his advisers? I must confess I see none. Of course, if the Legislature has declared clearly that it shall be withheld, there is an end of the matter. I am for the present only discussing the question whether it is likely that the Legislature should forbid the inspection by the accused of statements of witnesses, previously recorded by the Police, when these witnesses are giving evidence in Court for the prosecution. It must be remembered that even if the accused is allowed to see these previous statements, and if a different story is told therein from that deposed to by the witnesses in Court, this will not of itself benefit him, for it is only by proof of previous inconsistent statements that the credit of a witness can be shaken, and the production of these statements is no proof that the witnesses said what is recorded in them. That has to be proved by the evidence of persons who heard the witnesses make those statements. I would also remark here that, even if the Police have made no record of previous statements [419] of the witnesses for the prosecution, or if a record was made and it be held that an accused is not entitled to see that record, that will not prevent the accused from proving aliunde, if he can, that a witness has made a statement which is inconsistent with the evidence he is giving in Court. If, however, the accused or his agent be allowed to see what a witness for the prosecution is recorded to have previously said to the Police, this may materially aid him in his endeavour to prove that the witness is untrustworthy; and I see no reason why this assistance should be withheld from him.

I am clearly of opinion that there is no bar whatever to the accused seeing previous statements of witnesses called for the prosecution recorded by the Police under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and not incorporated in the diary. The most difficult question is whether statements of such witnesses can be seen when incorporated in the diary.

The learned Chief Justice has demonstrated that the diary was never intended to be a bald record of the investigating officer's movements, and of the names of the witnesses he has examined. I am quite unable to go the length contended for by the learned counsel who argued the case on behalf of the appellant, and hold that even a summary of facts ascertained by the investigating officer from the examination of a number of witnesses is not protected. But I regret I am equally unable to concur with the learned Chief Justice in holding that the special diary "no matter what it may contain" is absolutely privileged, unless under the circumstances stated in the concluding portion of s. 172.

According to s. 172, the diary over which the cloak of privilege is thrown by the section is to contain a record of the proceedings of the investigating officer. Amongst the things to be entered by him in his diary is "a statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation." It may in some cases be difficult to draw the line between what is "a statement of the circumstances ascertained through the investigation" and the statement of a witness recorded by the Police officer in his diary. But [420] I think that, as a rule, a Court would have no difficulty in saying what was the statement of a witness and what was a statement by the Police officer of circumstances ascertained through his investigation. The latter would be privileged; the former, I hold, would not be.

It never could be contended that an accused or his agent is entitled to ransack a special diary on the chance of discovering something that might tell in his favour. It is perfectly right, said Eyre, C.J., in a case cited by Field in his Law of Evidence (5th edition, p. 580) "that all opportunities should be afforded to discuss the truth of evidence given against a prisoner; but there is a rule which has universally obtained, on account of its importance to the public for the detection of crimes, that those persons who are the channel by means of which the detection is made should not be unnecessarily disclosed." I do not see how this rule would be offended against by allowing a prisoner to see previous statements of witnesses who are actually giving evidence against him in Court. If, then, there is in the diary what is, in the opinion of the Court, the record of a statement made to the Police by a witness who gives evidence in Court, then in my humble opinion the Court should allow the accused or his agent to see that record, taking the necessary precautions that no other part of the diary is disclosed. If such statements were intended by the Legislature to form part of the diary, no doubt they are privileged. But it is not clear to me that that was the intention of the Legislature. The provisions of the law in regard to the recording of statements of witnesses by the Police are to be found in ss. 161 and 162 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It is not until we come to s. 172 of that Code that we find the enactment of the Legislature in regard to what the diary is to contain, and in regard to the privilege which a diary framed in the manner described in the first paragraph of that section enjoys. Had the Legislature intended that the record of the statements of witnesses, which, according to s. 161, a Police officer may make if he chooses, was to form a part of the diary, it would, I think, have expressed [421] this intention. The facts that it has not is to my mind an indication that the view of Mr. Justice Field expressed in the case of Jhubboo Mahton (1) is right, namely, that the particulars required to be entered in the diary do not include statements of witnesses recorded under s. 161. Consequently these statements are not, to use the expression of Mr. Justice Field, "an integral portion of the diary," and are not in my view protected by the second paragraph of s. 172. That protection was necessary, inasmuch as a diary framed as prescribed in the first paragraph of the section might contain information which it would be contrary to public policy to disclose. But how it would be contrary to public policy to disclose what a witness who is giving evidence in Court had previously said to the Police in regard to the charge under investigation, I fail to see. Such a disclosure might militate against the securing of a conviction. But if a witness has made inconsistent statements it is in the interest of justice, and therefore of the highest public policy, that this should be known. It must not be forgotten that the Legislature has declared that a person examined by a Police officer who is investigating a case "shall be bound to answer truly all questions relating to such case put to him by such officer," save when the answer would tend to expose him to a criminal charge or to a penalty or forfeiture.

The provisions of s. 145 of the Evidence Act are in my opinion material in considering the question under discussion. That section runs

19 A. 390= the credit of a witness may be impeached is by proof of former statements
17 A.W.N. inconsistent with any part of his evidence which is liable to be contradicted:
(1897) 174. [422] and, as we have just seen, s. 145 gives the right to cross-examine a witness on previous statements made by him and reduced into writing when these previous statements are relevant to the matter in issue. The Evidence Act (No. I of 1872) was passed before the Code of Criminal Procedure of 1872. It seems to me that if the Legislature had intended that accused persons should have no right to see previous statements of witness who give evidence against them so as to be able to cross-examine on them as provided in s. 145 of the Evidence Act, it would have clearly declared such statements to be privileged, either in Act No. X of 1872 or Act No. X of 1882 or Act No. X of 1886.

The last Act contained a section dealing specially with statements of persons made to Police officer during the course of an investigation. S. 162 of Act No. X of 1882 had declared that such statements if reduced into writing were not to be used as evidence. Act No. X of 1886 qualified this by enacting that such statements if reduced to writing were not to be used as evidence against the accused. It has been held that these statements may be used in evidence on behalf of the accused; why then should he not be allowed to see them if reduced into writing by the Police?

But though I hold that an accused should be allowed to see what has been said previously in regard to the case under trial or inquiry, by a witness who is giving evidence against him in Court, it has to be remembered that the mere production of a statement recorded by the Police inconsistent with evidence given in Court does not impeach a witness' credit.
 It has to be proved to the satisfaction of the Court that the witness did in point of fact make previously a statement inconsistent with his evidence given in Court. I am glad that the Chief Justice has given prominence to the remarks of my brother Knox in the case Queen-Empress
v. Nasir-ud-din (1) as to the manner in which statements of witnesses are often recorded by investigating Police officers. We know that mistakes sometimes creep into the record of the evidence of [423] a witness given in Court. This liability to mistake is intensified when the witness' statement is recorded amidst all the difficulties so well described by my brother Knox, even where the investigating officer honestly desires to take down what the witness says, and has no desire to make the witness' statement fit into any pre-conceived theory of his own.
 When the writer of a statement recorded under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is called to prove it, he will naturally stick to what he has written, and assert that the witness did make the statement as recorded. But when a witness denies that he made a statement which is materially inconsistent with the evidence he gives in Court, the Court, before it allows its opinion as to the witness' credibility to be affected, must, I repeat, be satisfied that the witness did in fact make the previous inconsistent statement. When the

(1) 16 A. 207.

Court is so satisfied, it must give effect to its opinion. All Criminal Courts in this country know that the case against an accused person is frequently shaken by proof that the witnesses who implicate him in Court have done so as an afterthought. See, for example, the observations of the learned Chief Justice and my brother Banerji at page 61 in their judgment in the case Queen-Empress v. Taj Khan (1). I have had long experience of the Criminal Courts in this country, and I have no hesitation in saying that many innocent persons would be convicted were it not for proof that the witnesses who implicate them in Court told quite a different story at first. I should on this account be very unwilling to throw any obstacle in the way of an accused or his advisers seeing the record of a previous statement made by a witness for the prosecution, unless there is a clear enactment by the Legislature that the accused shall not see it. And I am unable to find any such clear enactment in the law. The caution with which evidence must be received as to a previous contradictory statement alleged to have been made to the Police does not in my opinion affect the principle as to the accused's right to see the record of the previous statement.

[424] But whether or not it be held that an accused is entitled to see the record of previous statements made by witnesses who are giving evidence against him, there is no doubt that the Court can see them. In his judgment in the case Kallu v. The Queen-Empress, referred to above, Sir Meredyth Plowden observes that it is competent for the accused "to move the Court, which is presumably impartial and endeavouring to ascertain the truth, to refer to the statements attributed in the diaries to a witness before the Court, and it is open to the Court, if need be, to cross-examine the witness after reference thereto." With this observation I entirely agree. The Court can cross-examine the witness as to his statement recorded in the diary before the statement is proved, but of course it cannot hold the witness to be contradicted by anything in the statement, until it be proved that the witness made the statement. If Courts took advantage of the right given them by law to use Police diaries to aid them in trials and inquiries, and so cleared up all material contradictions appearing between the statements recorded in those diaries and the evidence given in Court, the privilege of seeing the statements would not be of so much moment to the accused or his advisers. But a Court may be pressed for time, or may fail to appreciate the bearing of the statements in favour of the accused, as was the case in Sheru Sha v. The Queen-Empress (2). I think, therefore that the privilege of seeing the previous statements of witnesses is one which should not be withheld from the accused unless it is quite clear that the Legislature intended it to be withheld, and to my mind it is not clear that this was the intention of the Legislature.

In regard to the particular case before us, I have carefully read the evidence, and I concur with the learned Chief Justice in thinking that the guilt of the appellant is not proved beyond reasonable doubt. I therefore concur in the order proposed.

BANERJI, J.—I, too, regret my inability to concur with the learned Chief Justice on the principal question argued before us, namely, whether an accused person or his agent is entitled to call [425] for and see for the purpose of cross-examining and impeaching the credit of witnesses called for the prosecution, previous statements made by the witnesses to a Police officer and reduced by him into writing, if those statements happen to be CRIMINAL. embodied in the special diary prepared by the Police officer under s. 172 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. In my opinion such statements do not form an integral part of the diary, and are not entitled to the privilege given to a diary by s. 172. My reasons for this conclusion are generally the same as those stated in his judgment by my brother Aikman.

Section 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure empowers a Police officer making an investigation under Chapter XIV to examine orally any person supposed to be acquainted with the facts and circumstances of the case, and to reduce into writing any statement made by the person so examined. Section 162 provides that such statement, unless it be a dying declaration, shall not be used as evidence against the accused. It has been held by this Court in Queen-Empress v. Taj Khan (1) that such statement "when legally brought as evidence before the Court" by being duly proved can be used in favour of an accused person. This is in consonance with s. 155 of the Evidence Act, according to which one of the means by which the credit of a witness may be impeached is "proof of former statements inconsistent with any part of his evidence which is liable to be contradicted." Section 145 of the same Act provides that a witness may be cross-examined as to previous statements made by him, reduced into writing and relevant to the matters in question, "but if it is intended to contradict him by the writing, his attention must, before the writing can be proved, be called to those parts of it which are used for the purpose of contradicting him." If, therefore, the statement made to a Police officer by a witness for the prosecution has been reduced into writing under s. 161 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it is intended to contradict the witness by the writing, the attention of the witness must be called to the portion of the writing by which [426] it is intended to contradict him, before proof of the written statement can be given. This it will be impossible for the accused or his counsel to do, unless he has access to the writing and is allowed to call for and see it. In my opinion there is no reason for holding that a statement of a witness reduced into writing by a Police officer under s. 161 and not embodied in the special diary of that officer is entitled to the privilege of s. 172. I am not aware of any ruling, and none has been cited to us, in which it was held that an accused person or his agent has not the right to call for and see the record of such a statement. Now, did the Legislature intend to deprive an accused person of that right if the statement of a witness reduced into writing under s. 161 is, instead of being kept separate, incorporated in the diary? If the Legislature has in unmistakable language indicated such intention, a Court is bound to give effect to it. The object of the law of procedure including the law of evidence, is, or ought to be, as observed by Sir Barnes Peacock in Queen v. Nabadwip Goswami (2) "that the innocent shall be protected and the guilty punished." It is undeniable that an accused person should be afforded every facility consistent with law to establish his innocence. One of the means by which he may establish his innocence is by proving that the evidence brought forward to prove his guilt is not credible, and the credibility of a witness may be shaken by showing that in material particulars he has departed from a previous statement made by him in respect of the same matter. It is impossible to believe that the Legislature ever intended to deprive an accused person of any of the facilities which he might have for proving his innocence. I cannot conceive that in the case of a statement reduced to writing under s. 161, but not incorporated in the diary, the Legislature should have given an accused person the right which, in my opinion, he undoubtedly has of calling for and seeing that statement for the purpose of discrediting a witness brought forward to prove his guilt, and should have taken away that right if the same statement happened to be embodied in the diary. I am unable to impute such [427] inconsistency to the Legislature. In my opinion it was not the intention of the Legislature that statements reduced into writing by a Police officer under s. 161 should form a part of the diary prescribed in the first paragraph of s. 172; so that the prohibition contained in the second paragraph of that section as to the inspection of a diary by the accused or his agents was not meant to apply to such statements. I am not prepared to go the length of holding that the "statement of the circumstances ascertained through his investigation" by a Police officer, which he is required by s. 172 to set forth in his diary should not include a summary of what he may have ascertained from persons examined by him. The absence of such a summary from the diary is not likely to enable a Court "to discover further evidence or possible sources of evidence, which, if brought before the Court, may throw additional light upon the guilt or innocence of the accused." And this is the purpose for which the diary may, as Mr. Field rightly observes, be legitimately used by a Court (see note to s. 145 of the Evidence Act, 5th Edition, p. 640). There is nothing, however, in s. 172 which authorizes a Police officer to record in his diary the actual statement made by a person examined by him. Such a statement stands on a different footing from what may be called the Police officer's version of what he ascertained from a witness. And such a statement, whether it has been taken down in the direct form or in the oblique narrative, does not in my opinion form an integral part of the diary, and is not entitled to the privilege conferred on a diary by s. 172. That privilege in my opinion extends only to what may legitimately form the contents of a diary. It may therefore extend to the Police officer's version or summary of the statements made to him, but it does not extend to the statements themselves. In this view one has not to read into the second paragraph of s. 172, an exception which is not provided by that paragraph. That section is not so happily worded as it might have been—otherwise the difficulty which we have now to meet would not have arisen, and the misuse of Police diaries by Courts and Magistrates on which the [428] learned Chief Justice has animadverted would not have taken place. The conclusion at which I have arrived is fortified by the ruling of McDonnell and Field, JJ., in The Empress v. Jhubboo Mahton (1); of Mitter and Macpherson, JJ., in In the matter of Mahomed Ali Hadji v. The Queen-Empress (2); Trevelyan and Hill, JJ., in Bikao Khan v. The Queen-Empress (3); Trevelyan and Rampini, JJ., in Sheru Sha v. The Queen-Empress (4); and of my brother Aikman and Mr. Justice Blennerhassett in Queen-Empress v. Rudr Singh (5). I see no reason for holding that so many learned Judges have come to an erroneous conclusion, a conclusion which, in my humble judgment, will further the administration of justice instead of retarding it, and is not inconsistent with anything contained in the Code of Criminal Procedure.

(1) 17 A. 57.

SRI RAMAN LALJI MAHARAJ (Plaintiff) v. SRI GOPAL LALJI MAHARAJ AND OTHERS (Defendants). [15th April, 1897.]

Trust—Joint trustees of temple—Suit for partition of rights as trustees.

Held that rights as joint trustees to the management of and superintendence of worship at certain temples, none of the trustees having any personal pecuniary interest in the temples or their income, could not be made the subject of partition by a Civil Court, that is to say, that a Civil Court was not competent to grant a decree declaring that each of such trustees in rotation should for a certain definite period enjoy exclusively the rights of management and [429] superintendence. *Mitta Kunth Audhicarry v. THIS appeal arose out of a suit relating to two temples situated in Muttra and Gokul. The parties to the suit were members of the same family as indicated in the following genealogical table:—

The plaintiff came into Court alleging that he and the defendants were descendants of a common ancestor, as shown in the above genealogical tree, whose two sons Bithal Nathji and Parsotam Lalji were joint managers of the temples in suit, together with other temples and a large amount of property; that the plaintiff was the son of Parsotam Lalji and the defendants, grandsons of Bithal Nathji; that after the death of the two brothers the plaintiff and Kalian Raiji and Brij Nathji, sons of Bithal Nathji, became owners and managers of the temples and other properties and in possession of the same in the same manner as their ancestors; that on the 4th of March 1888 an agreement to refer to arbitration was entered into between the plaintiff on the one part and Kalian Raiji and Bithal Nathji on the other part, in consequence of which an award was made on the 15th of March 1888 whereby all the other temples and [430] properties belonging to the parties were divided between them, the temples and properties now in suit remaining joint.

The plaintiff further alleged that in consequence of misunderstandings and disagreements between the parties the temples and properties appertaining to them were not being properly managed, and that there was a likelihood of further disagreement and disturbances. The plaintiff accordingly prayed that the Court might pass an order directing that each party should remain in possession of the temples and other properties in suit for a certain specified period, and, secondly, that orders should be passed by the Court regarding the protection of the goods and other effects and properties belonging to the said temples, and regarding the appointments, dismissal and performances of duties of the servants attached to the temples in suit, and also regarding the mode of residence of the parties in the buildings attached to the temples and as to their repairs.

The defendants objected to the plaintiffs' claim in toto, denying that the properties in suit were joint or that the plaintiff had any right in them, and alleging that the succession to the temple properties was by primogeniture. There were also various technical pleas raised.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Agra) dismissed the suit so far as the first relief claimed by the plaintiff was concerned; but drew up a general scheme for the management of the temples and the property belonging to them.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J. (KNOX, J., concurring):—This is an appeal by the plaintiff against a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Agra. The parties are the descendants of two brothers whose family from time immemorial had been the hereditary trustees and managers of certain temples at Muttra and Gokul and of the endowments appertaining to them. It appears that sometime [431] before suit most of the landed property had been by a friendly arbitration divided between them, but that the temples were left joint. In the 10th paragraph of the plaint it was alleged that for some time there had been disagreements between the parties as to the employment and dismissal of servants, the distribution of offerings made at the temple, the expenses of daily worship, &c., &c., and that there was an apprehension of disturbances, loss of property, &c. The plaintiff therefore prayed the Court to declare that each party was entitled to manage and superintend the temples in turn and to give proper instructions for the custody of the property appertaining to the temples, for the appointment of servants and such matters, and for the mode of living of the parties in the houses appertaining to the temples as well as for the repairs of the houses.

As to the last mentioned matter, the plaintiff during the hearing of the suit explained (vide No. 506 of the record, at p. 49 of the respondents' printed book) that the dwelling-houses in question belong to the temples, that the plaintiff did not desire to have them partitioned, but wished that the parties should live in them as hitherto and that the Court should give directions as to their repair. A similar disclaimer of any desire to partition was made as to certain baithaks, or sitting-rooms.

On the following day (March 7th, 1895) another and most important admission was made on behalf of the plaintiff, and was concurred in on behalf of the defendants. According to that admission neither party has any personal pecuniary interest in the income of the temples, whether from property belonging to them or from offerings made by worshippers; all the income is declared by both parties to belong to the temples and to them only. This admission has the effect of correcting a statement made in the 7th paragraph of the plaint to the effect that "if there be any surplus income the parties appropriate it." It further is clear that in this case there is no dispute between the parties as to their right to share in the performance of the worship of the idols in the temples. The ceremonies of public worship are, as appears [432] from the plaint, performed by the servants attached to the temples and the parties are at liberty to take whatever share they please in them. Accordingly, on the allegations of the plaint and on the admission of the parties, it is clear that these temples are trust property in which none of the parties have any pecuniary interest, and that from time immemorial the management has been joint in the hands of the family to which the parties belong.

Thus the main relief asked for in the plaint narrowed itself down to a prayer that the Court would partition their duties as trustees and managers between the parties, and would fix stated periods during which each party in turn would hold exclusive possession of the temples and carry on the management. It was suggested that a period of six months in each year should be assigned to each.

The Subordinate Judge who tried the suit refused to grant to the plaintiff the relief he asked for. In a carefully considered judgment the Subordinate Judge pointed out most properly that this suit was not one for a declaration of plaintiff's right to share in conducting public worship at the temple and to a participation in the offerings. As to that matter he showed there was no dispute whatever, the real dispute being as to plaintiff's claim to hold the management "in turn."

The plaintiff appeals, contending that the relief asked for by him should have been granted. That was the only one of the grounds of appeal which was argued before us.

In support of his contention the learned vakil for the appellant cited to us several cases from the Bombay and Calcutta reports, e.g., Mitta Kunth Audhicarry v. Neerunjun Audhicarry (1). This case clearly is not in point in the present appeal. It was a case in which a person, who possessed jointly with others a right to worship at a certain shrine and to participate in the offerings, prayed to have his right partitioned from those of his co-sharers and to have periods fixed during which he might exercise it. The High Court held that such a right was a property [433] which could be partitioned like other kinds of property. In Mancharam v. Pranshankar (2) the Bombay High Court held that a transfer by a divided Hindu of his right to perform public worship and to participate in the offerings at the temple was not invalid. The cases Limba bin Krishna v. Rama bin Pimplu (1), Anandamoyi Chaudroni v. Baikant Nath Rae (2) and Pranshankar v. Prannath (3) were cases in which the plaintiffs set up their right to conduct public worship and to receive a share in the offerings made at the temples, and Ram Soondur Thakoor v. Taruck Chunder Turkoruttun (4) was a suit in which to establish similar rights the plaintiff sought to be authorized to remove an idol to his house.

All the above cases differ essentially from the present case in that in all of them there was a dispute as to the plaintiff's right to share in the manner set up by them in the performance of public worship and to receive a share in the offerings. Such cases cannot be considered as in any way laying down a rule applicable to the present case in which there is no such dispute.

The parties here are the joint managing trustees of the temples, whose duty it is as such to manage the affairs to the best of their united abilities, a duty which they undertook to perform when they accepted the trust. They have no rights of property or any personal pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of the trust. Is then one of such trustees entitled to ask a Court to partition the duties of the trust between himself and his co-trustees, and, e.g., to give to him the exclusive management of, and possession of, the trust property for, say, six months in each year, putting the other trustees entirely aside during his period of management? We think not. We regard the body of trustees as being each of them not merely entitled, but also as being obliged by his acceptance of the trust to act jointly at all times with the others in the management of the trust property. The duty incumbent on the trustees is one incumbent on them acting jointly, and is not a "property" [434] personal to any one of them individually or to all of them jointly. As it is not a personal property, it does not come under the rule as to partition laid down in the first of the cases cited above. Such a duty cannot in our opinion be partitioned.

Something was said at the hearing as to the partition by arbitration which had already been made by the parties. No issue was raised before us as to that partition. It is therefore unnecessary for us to express any opinion as to whether it is a valid instrument or not. We concur with the lower Court in holding that the appellant is not entitled to partition in this case. We therefore dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

(1897) 109.Mortgage by conditional sale—Sale with a right of re-purchase—Conditional sale effected by two contemporaneous deeds—Evidence dehors the documents admissible to show what the transaction really was.

The plaintiff and the defendants executed upon the same day two documents. The one purported to be a deed of absolute sale of a certain estate by the plaintiff to the defendants. The other was an agreement by which the defendants covenanted, upon payment of a certain sum by a specified date, to reconvey the property sold by the first mentioned deed.

Held, that evidence was admissible deshors the documents to show that the intention of the parties was not to effect an out and out sale with merely a right of re-purchase under certain conditions left in the vendor, but to constitute a mortgage by conditional sale, or bai-bil-wafa.

The mere fact of a deed of absolute sale being accompanied by another deed giving a right of re-purchase will not, for that reason alone, constitute the transaction one of mortgage, but the intention of the parties must be gathered from the terms of the deeds or from the surrounding circumstances or from both.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The plaintiff in the suit, out of which this appeal has arisen was the owner of an estate, called Taluqa Pataila, in the district of Jaunpur, which he obtained from the Government in 1861, as a reward for services done during the mutiny. He was also an indigo planter, carrying on a factory called the Basharatpur concern. In 1869 he mortgaged the Taluqa to Mr. W. Smyth for Rs. 1,30,000. In order to discharge the debt due to Mr. Smyth, he, on the 8th of April, 1872, executed two deeds in favour of Balkishan Das, defendant, and his brother Hari Das, the deceased father of the other defendants. One of these was a deed of simple mortgage for Rs. 1,25,000, in which the Taluqa Pataila was mortgaged, and the other was an instrument called a deed of estimate, securing a sum of Rs. 60,000. A part of this amount was appropriated to the discharge of the mortgage in favour of Smyth, and the remainder was an advance taken for the purpose of manufacturing indigo. In the deed last mentioned certain factories and houses were hypothecated. On the 4th of February, 1873, two documents were executed which have given rise to the present litigation. One of them was a deed of absolute sale of Taluqa Pataila executed by the plaintiff in favour of Balkishan Das and Hari Das for a consideration of Rs. 1,50,000. The other was a deed of agreement (igarnama) executed by Balkishan Das and Hari Das in favour of the plaintiff, Mr. Legge, in which they covenanted that if the vendor paid on the 1st of March, 1876, the sum of Rs. 1,65,000 in a lump sum, [436] together with any amount which might remain due on account of advances annually made for the purpose of carrying on the Basharatpur indigo factory, the property conveyed by the deed of sale would be by them re-conveyed to Mr. Legge. It is alleged on behalf of the plaintiff that these two deeds constitute a mortgage by conditional sale which the plaintiff is entitled to redeem, and the present suit was brought to redeem that mortgage.

On the other hand the defendants' case is that the transaction between the parties was one of absolute sale with a right of re-purchase on or before the 1st of March, 1876, and that the plaintiff, not having exercised the right within the time fixed, is no longer entitled to get back the property. The simple issue, therefore, is whether the transaction evidenced by the two deeds of the 4th of February, 1873, was, as alleged by the plaintiff, a mortgage by conditional sale, or, as alleged by the defendants, an absolute sale with a limited right of re-purchase. The Court below has held that the transaction was one of mortgage and has granted to the plaintiff a decree for redemption, conditional upon the payment of certain amounts to which we shall refer hereafter. The defendants have preferred this appeal, and the plaintiff has filed objections under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

There can be no doubt that the deed executed by the plaintiff on the 4th of February, 1873, is on the face of it a deed of absolute sale. But that circumstance alone would not preclude the Court from considering whether the transaction was in reality a mortgage by conditional sale. A mortgage by conditional sale is thus defined in cl. (c) of s. 58 of Act No. IV of 1882 :—"Where the mortgagor ostensibly sells the mortgaged property, on condition that on default of payment of the mortgage money on a certain date the sale shall become absolute, or on condition that on such payment being made the sale shall become void, or, on condition that on such payment being made the buyer shall transfer the property to the seller, the transaction is called a mortgage by conditional sale." A transaction, therefore, which on the face of it is a sale, may be in reality a mortgage by conditional [437] sale, if it comes within the above definition. In order to determine whether the transaction is a mortgage, or sale with a condition of re-purchase, what we have to look to is the intention of the parties. This intention may be gathered from the terms of the deeds, or from the surrounding circumstances, or from both. That evidence dehors the documents is admissible to prove the intention is well established by numerous authorities, of which we need only refer to Alderson v. White (1), Lincoln v. Wright (2), and to the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din (3). In that case, as in the present, there were two documents of even date, one being a deed of absolute sale, the other being a contract by the vendee to give the vendor a right to re-purchase on payment of the sale price within ten years. Their Lordships held on a construction of those documents that the transaction between the parties was not one of mortgage, but was one of absolute sale with a right to re-purchase. The effect of that ruling, in our opinion, is that the mere fact of a deed of absolute sale being accompanied by another deed giving to the vendor a right of re-purchase would not for that reason alone constitute the transaction one of mortgage. Still, as was observed in the judgment of this Court in Ali Ahmad v. Rahmat-ullah (1), in which the above ruling was considered, this Court would be bound to follow that ruling in any case in which the circumstances are similar.

We have, therefore, to consider whether the circumstances of this case are similar to those of the case of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din referred to above. From the pleadings in that case it appears that the only defence raised in it was whether the deed conferring on the vendor the right of re-purchase was a genuine document. With the exception of the documents themselves there was no evidence to show the intention of the contracting parties in regard to the transaction. On this point we have [438] satisfied ourselves by a reference to the records of the case. This being so, their Lordships could not but hold that the transaction was one of sale with a right of re-purchase.

Before proceeding to consider the nature of the transaction entered into by the parties on the 4th of February, 1873, we may observe that that transaction took place long before the Transfer of Property Act of 1882 was enacted, and that, according to the plaintiff, the transaction was what is known in these Provinces as a bai-bil-wafa mortgage, which is a mortgage by conditional sale. As was observed in Ali Ahmad v. Rahmat-ullah (1) this form of mortgage "was introduced to enable Muhammadans, contrary to the precept of the Muhammadan law against lending money at interest, to lend money at interest and to obtain security for the re-payment of the principal and interest." It was also observed that a mortgage transaction of this description was understood by the people of these Provinces "as being capable of being effected in different ways, as for instance, by a deed which purported to assign the property absolutely, but which contained a stipulation for a right of re-purchase, or by two contemporaneous deeds, one of which purported to effect an absolute and unconditional sale, and the other of which was an agreement that the apparent vendor should have a right of re-purchase." See also the observations of Turner, C.J., on the same subject in Ramasami Sastrigal v. Samiyappanayakan (2). We may add, as was also observed in Ali Ahmad v. Rahmat-ullah, that in this part of India Muhammadan forms of conveyancing were followed for many centuries and are still not uncommon.

We may also remark that in our experience an absolute sale with a right of re-purchase is very rare in these Provinces, and that, before the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din, the usual conception was that where there were two contemporaneous deeds, one of which was a deed of absolute sale and the other an agreement conferring [439] on the ostensible vendor a right of re-purchase, the transaction constituted a bai-bil-wafa or mortgage by conditional sale. In our opinion it is necessary to bear these facts in mind in considering what the intention of the contracting parties was when they entered into the transaction.

(1) 14 A. 195.

(2) 4 M. 179 (183 and 184).

As we have stated above, Taluqa Pataila, the property which the plaintiff seeks to redeem in this suit, was mortgaged by him to Mr. W. Smyth for Rs. 1,30,000 in 1869. The plaintiff was unable to discharge that mortgage, and in order to raise funds, not only for re-paying the debt due to Mr. Smyth, but also for carrying on his indigo concern, the plaintiff was on the look-out for a banker. He was introduced to Hari Das and Balkishan Das, two rich bankers of Benares. He borrowed from them Rs. 1,85,000 under the two deeds of the 8th of April, 1872, to which we have referred above, discharged the mortgage in favour of Mr. Smyth, and allowed Rs. 40,000 out of the amount of the instrument called the deed of estimate to remain in the hands of the creditors to be drawn on from time to time for carrying on the indigo concern. It was evidently in the contemplation of the parties that in future years similar estimates would be prepared as to the requirements of the plaintiff for his indigo business and advances taken from Hari Das and Balkishan Das to meet those requirements, and that the amounts advanced would be re-paid out of the proceeds of the sale of indigo. We have referred to this fact as it has a considerable bearing on the terms of the agreement of the 4th of February, 1873. The circumstances which, according to the plaintiff, led to the execution of the two deeds of that date were these. In January, 1873, the sum of Rs. 1,90,000 was due to Hari Das and Balkishan Das by the plaintiff and his partner, one De Momet, on account of principal and interest due upon the instruments of the 8th of April, 1872. The plaintiff asked Hari Das to make him further advances. He refused on the ground that De Momet was an unlucky man, but agreed to help the plaintiff if De Momet could be got rid of. De Momet agreed to retire, and executed two deeds in [440] favour of the plaintiff on the 14th of January, 1873, and withdrew from the partnership. The plaintiff states that he informed Hari Das of this and met him at Benares at the house of Mr. Smyth. We may remark in passing that at the period referred to Balkishan Das was very young, and Hari Das was the leading member of the firm, which belonged to the two brothers. What next happened we will state in the plaintiff's own words:—
 "Mr. Smyth suggested that Hari Das would reduce the interest if he were put in possession of Pataila. Hari Das then said that he would like to see the estate first of all. A few days afterwards Hari Das saw the estate and I met him at the Kataban factory. Hari Das approved of the estate and asked me to sell it out and out. I declined and refused to sell on any account. After this Hari Das agreed to take possession of Pataila and said that I should execute a bai-bil-wafa mortgage with possession. The exact terms were not then settled. He was anxious to go away, and said he would send me a draft from Benares. He subsequently sent me the draft * * *. There were two drafts. I objected to the form of the document, which seemed to me to be a sale. Hari Das then said that with the igrarnama it would be a bai-bil-wafa mortgage, and that this was the ordinary form of a mortgage with possession. I then consulted Mr. Man (a pleader, who was putting up in the same house of Mr. Nickels). Mr. Man told me that the two documents made a bai-bil-wafa, but I was to be sure that the igrarnama was to be executed at the same time as the other deed. The terms settled were that Rs. 1,50,000 were to be lent on the taluqa, the profits to go for interest, and I was to pay Rs. 15,000 extra, as Hari Das said this was to protect him against loss." If the above statement be true, there can be no doubt that the contracting parties intended the transaction to be one of a bai-bil-wafa mortgage, that is, of a mortgage by conditional sale.

Now let us see whether the terms of the deed itself afford any evidence of such intention. Those terms, as translated and printed at p. 21 of the appellant's paper book, are as follows:—[441] "We the executants, therefore, of our own free will and accord, covenant and declare that if the said vendor pays on the 1st of March, 1876, the amount of Rs. 1,65,000 in a lump sum, we shall sell to the said vendor the whole of the said ilaga sold, as it exists at present, for the said amount of Rs. 1,65,000, and we shall cause everything connected with mutation of names, &c., to be done; neither we nor our heirs shall have any objection thereto. If we or our heirs raise any objections to receive the money or relinquish the property, the vendor shall be competent to deposit the said amount in cash in the Government treasury, by virtue of this agreement, and obtain possession of the ilaga, we shall have no sort of objection to it. It has further been stipulated between us, the executants and the vendor, that the latter would also have to pay, along with this amount, whatever money may be due to us by the vendor at the time, in the event of additions and alterations being made annually with our consent in the amount of estimate of the concern of the Basharatpur factory, and the sahib shall not be competent to effect a sale (sic. repurchase) until the payment of the estimate money relating to the factories of the Basharatpur concern. We shall recover from the vendor any amount of arrears that may be due to us by the tenants by making an assignment thereof in favour of the vendor, and after the expiry of the 1st of March, 1876, the said vendor shall not be competent either to pay the money or to make the purchase, and the conditions of this deed of agreement shall be deemed to be null and void."

The first clause to which we wish to refer is that which provides that in the event of the refusal of Hari Das and Balkishan Das or their heirs to receive the amount, upon the payment of which the property was to be re-conveyed, the plaintiff would be competent to deposit that amount in the Government Treasury. Regulation I of 1798, which is entitled "A regulation to prevent fraud and injustice in conditional sales of land under deeds of bai-bil-wafa or other deeds of the same nature," provides in its second section that a borrower of money under a deed of bai-bil-wafa [442] or other deed of conditional sale who may be desirous to redeem his land may tender to the lender the amount due to him or deposit that amount "in the dewany adawlut of the city or zila in which the land may be situated." There was no other authority sanctioning the deposit of money of this description in a Government Treasury. It seems to us, therefore, that the provision in the deed as to the deposit in the Government Treasury of the money payable by the plaintiff evidently referred to the deposit which could be made under Regulation I of 1798, and this circumstance, to our minds, strongly indicates that the parties contemplated the transaction to be one of loan secured by a mortgage. The stipulation as to payment into the Government Treasury in the event of the vendees refusing to receive the money would, as the learned counsel for the appellants was forced to admit, be meaningless if the agreement was merely a promise by the vendees to re-sell the property on certain terms, as in such a case no Government Treasury would receive the money; whereas, if it were a mortgage, the money would, if the mortgagees refused to take it, be lodged in the Government Treasury through the medium of the Civil Court.

A similar indication is afforded by the next clause in the deed, which provides that upon payment of a lump sum of Rs. 1,65,000, in addition to other amounts, within three years, a re-sale could be obtained. The amount of consideration for the sale-deed executed by the plaintiffs was, as we have said, Rs. 1,50,000. It is not likely that the value of the property would have increased by Rs. 15,000 at the end of three years. That amount was therefore to be paid to Hari Das and Balkishan Das for the use of Rs. 1,50,000 for three years, that is, at the rate of Rs. 5,000 per annum. During this period of three years those persons were to enjoy the usufruct of the property, which, according to Balkishan Das, (see p. 33 of the appellants' book) amounted to about Rs. 10,000 a year, so that they were to obtain during the three years Rs. 15,000 a year,—a sum which exactly represents the interest on Rs. 1,50,000 at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum.

[443] It seems to us, therefore, that the payment of the additional sum of Rs. 15,000 was stipulated for in order to secure to Hari Das and Balkishan Das interest on the Rs. 15,000 at 10 per cent. per annum. And this circumstance is to our minds a clear indication that the transaction was one of a loan and not of an out and out purchase.

There is yet another provision in the deed which indicates the real nature of the transaction. It is to the effect that, in order to entitle the plaintiff to obtain a re-conveyance of the property, he was to pay, along with the Rs. 1,65,000 aforesaid, whatever sums might be found to be due on account of the estimate being altered and renewed from year to year by mutual consent. According to this provision, which has not been very accurately translated, the plaintiff was to pay, not only the Rs. 1,50,000, the consideration-money for the so-called sale, not only an additional sum of Rs. 15,000 on account of what we consider to be interest, not only the amount which might be due on account of advances made for carrying on the indigo concern of the plaintiff, but also the balance of any future advances that might be made for the same purpose.

The deed thus secured re-payment not only of past advances, but also of advances to be made in the future. We find that on the 6th of April, 1873, that is, subsequently to the date of the deed in question, the plaintiff executed in favour of Hari Das and Balkishan Das a deed of estimate for carrying on his indigo concern, for the sum of Rs. 75,000. It appears from a deed executed by the plaintiff on the 3rd of March, 1874, that Rs. 70,546-14-3 was due upon the deed of the 6th of April, 1873, up to the 25th of January, 1874, and that by the deed of the 3rd of March, 1874, a further advance was taken of Rs. 30,000. For this total sum of Rs. 1,00,546-14-3 the only securities held by Hari Das and Balkishan Das were Rs. 8,000 agreed to be paid on account of interest by Kelly & Co., of Calcutta; Rs. 5,000 which Mr. Nickels undertook to pay; and factories and bungalows which were subsequently purchased by Hari Das and Balkishan Das themselves for Rs. 66,000. There was still a sum of Rs. 21,546-14-6 and interest thereon, which would, save for the precarious outturn of indigo, remain unsecured, unless, as has been urged with much force on behalf of the plaintiff, the security for this sum was the property now in question. It would thus appear that Hari Das and Balkishan Das themselves looked to the Pataila property as security for future advances, and this they could not have done had the property been absolutely sold to them. We are therefore of opinion that the iqarnama of the 4th

1897 of February, 1873, itself affords intrinsic evidence showing that the APRIL 23. transaction was intended by the contracting parties to be one of mortgage — and not an absolute sale with a right of re-purchase.
 APPEL- There are many extraneous circumstances which we think lead to LATE the same conclusion. The igrarnama of the 4th of February, 1873, was CIVIL. stamped as a declaration of trust and not as agreement, and this shows — that the parties did not understand it to be an agreement to re-sell.
 19 A. 434= Another circumstance is the absence of a motive for the plaintiff to part 17 A.W.N. absolutely with the most valuable portion of the property he possessed.
 (1897) 109. It is clear that he was anxious to continue his indigo concern, and for that purpose he was in need of funds, which he could raise without difficulty if he retained in his hands the equity of redemption of the property in question.
 It is not likely, therefore, that he entered into a contract of the nature alleged by the defendants. A third circumstance is the form adopted—a form commonly used in these Provinces to represent a bai-bil-wafa mortgage. A fourth circumstance is the paucity of instances in this part of the country of absolute sales with an option of re-purchase, which renders it unlikely that the parties entered into a transaction of that description, almost unknown in these Provinces. A fifth, and by no means an unimportant, circumstance is the value of the property. Taking the figures given by Balkishan Das (see p. 33 of the appellant's book) the income from the estate, exclusive of rent in kind, was, in 1873, Rs. 17,299-3-0. It appears from the [445] mortgage deed of the 8th of April, 1872, that the revenue was Rs. 6,506-10-0. The profits therefore amounted to at least Rs. 10,792-9-0 per annum. Whilst it is asserted on behalf of the defendants that the market value of such property is 16½ years' purchase, it has been shown on behalf of the plaintiff that it varies from 22 to 25 years' purchase. As the property is situated in a permanently settled district, probabilities are in favour of the valuation alleged on behalf of the plaintiff. So that the property was worth more than 2½ lakhs of rupees, and the consideration for the alleged sale was inadequate. Although, as Mr. Conlan argues, this inadequacy of consideration may not be a conclusive test, it is certainly, in our opinion, one of the tests by which the real nature of the transaction may be determined. A sixth circumstance is the existence of the relation of debtor and creditor between the parties previously to the date of the transaction in question, and this circumstance renders it probable that the same relation was continued.

We have thus from the terms of the deed itself and from the surrounding circumstances almost all the criteria by which, according to Butler, as quoted in Bapaji Apoji v. Senavaraji Marvadi (1) it may be judged whether the transaction was intended to be a mortgage by conditional sale or an absolute sale with an option of re-purchase. We agree with Westropp, C.J., that the tests enumerated by Mr. Butler are not the only tests, and we are of opinion that there may be many other circumstances, such as exist in this case, which indicate the true character of the transaction.

It is true that one criterion, according to the English authorities, for deciding whether the transaction is a mortgage or not is the presence or absence of a right in the grantor to recover the amount on payment of which the property is to be re-conveyed, and this test was applied by the Bombay High Court in the case cited above. We are, however, of opinion that this test cannot be applied to the case of bai-bil-wafa mortgages which obtain in [446] these Provinces and are unknown in the Presidency of Bombay. In the case of such mortgages, which are mortgages by conditional sale, the mortgagee has no personal remedy against the mortgagor for the mortgage money, and his only remedy is a decree for foreclosure (see s. 87 of Act No. IV of 1882), and therefore the test referred to above cannot in these Provinces enable a Court to decide as to the character of the transaction (see Tagore Law Lectures on Mortgage by Dr. Rashbehary Ghose, 2nd edition, p. 199). For the above reason the rulings of the Bombay High Court relied upon by the learned counsel for the appellants are distinguishable from the present case. The decision of this Court in Bhup Kuar v. Muhammadi Begam (1) and of the Madras High Court in Venkappa Chetti v. Akku (2), also relied upon by the learned counsel, have no application, as the two deeds in question in those cases were not of contemporaneous date.

(1) 2 B. 231 (244 and 245).

Turning now to the oral evidence in this case, we have the evidence of the plaintiff himself which we have quoted at length in an earlier part of this judgment. The plaintiff, Mr. Legge, is an old man, seventy five years of age, and his statements on this point are borne out in important particulars. Moreover, it is not in the present suit that he has for the first time asserted that the transaction into which he entered with regard to the Pataila estate was a mortgage by conditional sale and not an absolute sale. On the 26th of May, 1876, only about three months after the date on which, according to the defendants he could have exercised his option of re-purchase, he stated in a deposition given by him in a suit brought against him by Hari Das and Balkishan Das that he had made a conditional sale of the estate in favour of those persons, and he reiterated the same statement in the written statement filed by him in that case (see pp. 28 and 29 of the respondent's book). It is true that no issue arose in that case as to the nature of the transaction now in question, but as the statement was made it would in all probability have been traversed by Hari Das and Balkishan Das, [447] and would not have been allowed to go unchallenged had it been absolutely untrue. We cannot suppose that so far back as 1876, when the plaintiff had no immediate prospect of being able to claim the property, he made an untrue statement in order to make evidence for a suit for redemption which he might possibly bring in the distant future. The fact of his making the statements to which we have referred affords strong corroboration to his present allegation that the transaction was a mortgage. That allegation is further corroborated by Mr. Man, a vakil of this Court, whom the plaintiff says he consulted at the time. Mr. Man is a marginal witness to the igrarnama of the 4th of February, 1873, and there can be no doubt as to his presence at the time of its execution. He has sworn that Mr. Legge, the plaintiff, had a conversation with him about the transaction in question, that "Mr. Legge did not wish to make an out and out sale of the estate, and on my advice an igrarnama was drawn up, the effect of which would be, as I told Mr. Legge, to enable him to get back his estate and make the transaction to be a bai-bil-wafa (mortgage by conditional sale)." He added:—"At the time of execution Hari Das made no objection as far as I remember. Had he objected I would not have signed the deed, nor would Hari Das have signed had he objected." Mr. Man is a perfectly disinterested witness, and we do not see the slightest reason to question the truth of what he has stated. His evidence leaves no room for doubt that the parties intended the transaction to be one of mortgage and the two deeds now in question were drawn up under his advice for the purpose of evidencing a contract of mortgage by conditional sale and not a contract of sale with an option of re-purchase.

Against this evidence, which in our opinion is of very great value, we have the statements of Balkishan Das, the defendant, and of two of his servants, Dwarka Parsad and Chunnu Lal. Balkishan Das was, in 1873, barely 19 years of age, and, although he must have been present when the transaction took place, he evidently did not take any part in it, and everything was done by his elder brother Hari Das, who managed the affairs of their [448] firm. We are, therefore, unable to place any weight on the statements of Balkishan Das. The evidence given by the other two witnesses is inconsistent, improbable, and incredible.

As great stress was laid by respondent's counsel in the argument before us on the fact of the non-production of their account-books by the defendants, we directed those books to be produced before us, and we have taken evidence in regard to the entries contained in them relating to the various transactions with the plaintiff. The accounts do not throw any light on the question we have to determine. The transaction of the 4th of February, 1873, has been entered in the books as a transaction of sale, which, on the face of it, it purports to be. There is no reference to the right of re-purchase nor to a right to redeem. The account books, therefore, do not in our opinion assist the case of either party.

Upon a consideration of the terms of the igrarnama, the surrounding circumstances and the oral evidence, we have come to the conclusion, in concurrence with the Court below, that the contracting parties intended the transaction to be one of mortgage by conditional sale, and not an absolute sale with a right to re-purchase. This case is therefore perfectly distinguishable from that of Bhagwan Sahai v. Bhagwan Din decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council and relied upon by defendants.

Now remains the question of the amount which the plaintiff must pay in order to obtain redemption. The Court below has held that the amount payable under the igrarnama of the 4th of February, 1873, consists, in addition to the Rs. 1,65,000 mentioned therein, of the arrears due by tenants and of Rs. 5,953-2-3 due on the deed of estimate of the 6th of April, 1873, and interest on that amount up to the 1st of March, 1876. As for the arrears, the Subordinate Judge remarks that no evidence has been adduced to prove the amount of the arrears. He has directed an inquiry to be held in execution of decree for the purpose of ascertaining that amount and has made a decree for the payment of the amount which may be so ascertained. This procedure is certainly not [449] warranted by any provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was not a case of mesne profits, the determination of the amount of which in execution proceedings is sanctioned by s. 212 of the Code. In order to enable the Court to make a decree for redemption under s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, the Court ought to have ascertained the amount payable under the mortgage, as it was bound to declare in the decree the sum upon payment of which within the time fixed redemption was to take place. That portion of the decree of the Court below, therefore, which directs the arrears due by tenants to be ascertained in execution proceedings cannot be sustained. It was the duty of the defendants to prove what amount of arrears was due, and, as they failed to do so, their claim for the arrears ought to have been disallowed. This, we may remark, will not prejudice the defendants, as they will be entitled to realize from tenants the arrears accruing due previous to redemption.

As regards the sum of Rs. 5,953-2-3, whilst it is contended on behalf of the defendants-appellants that interest should have been allowed on that amount, not only till the 1st of March, 1876, but also for the period subsequent to that date, it is urged on behalf of the plaintiff that no portion of that amount should have been decreed, the plaintiff's allegation being that Hari Das and Balkishan Das relinquished their claim to that amount upon the plaintiff's undertaking not to prosecute them for perjury. The only evidence in support of the plaintiff's allegation is his own deposition, which on this point is not corroborated by any other evidence. We agree with the Subordinate Judge that the evidence is not sufficient to justify our relieving the plaintiff of his liability to pay that amount. We are further of opinion that interest should have been awarded on that amount for the period subsequent to the 1st of March, 1876. The deed of estimate of the 6th of April, 1873, under which that sum was due provides for the payment of interest. It is true that when on the 28th of March, 1875, Mr. Legge admitted Rs. 5,953-2-3 to be the balance due on that date upon that instrument, he made an indorsement to the effect that the balance [450] would be payable "in a year without interest" (see appellant's book, p. 31). But we are unable to agree with the learned counsel for the respondent that there was a novation of the original contract and that no further interest was payable on the sum of Rs. 5,953-2-3. In our opinion the plaintiff would not have been liable to pay interest had he made the payment within one year. But as he failed to do so, the defendants are entitled to obtain interest on that amount in accordance with the terms of the deed of the 6th of April, 1873. In this respect, the decree of the Court below should in our judgment be varied.

The appellants in their petition of appeal raised a plea to the effect that they were entitled to compensation for improvements. Their learned counsel, Mr. Conlan, conceded that no evidence had been adduced to prove improvements. The appellants are not, therefore, entitled to obtain any compensation on account of improvements.

The result is that we vary the decree below by setting aside that portion of it which directs that the amount of arrears due by tenants should be assessed in execution proceedings, and by awarding further interest on Rs. 5,953-2-3, referred to above, at the rate of 12 per cent. per annum from the 1st of March, 1876, to the date hereinafter mentioned or the date of payment, if payment be made on an earlier date. We direct the parties to pay and receive the costs of litigation in proportion to their failure and success. We extend the time for the payment of the mortgage-money to the 31st July, 1897, and in other respects we affirm the decree below.

Held that a suit by a lessor against his lessee to recover rent which had accrued due in respect of agricultural land situated in Gwalior, the plaintiff being a subject of the Gwalior State, but the defendant a British subject [451] resident in the district of Jhansi, was properly brought in a Civil Court in the district of Jhansi. Gurdyal Singh v. The Raja of Faridkot (1), referred to.

THIS was a suit to recover arrears of rent due on account of certain agricultural land situated in the State of Gwalior. The plaintiff was a subject of the Gwalior State. The defendants were subjects of the Queen-Empress and resided in the district of Jhansi. The contract was made in Gwalior. The suit was brought in the Court of the Munsif of Jhansi. The question whether the suit was cognizable in the Court in which it was brought was raised before the Munsif, who decided it in favour of the plaintiff with reference to s. 17 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The defendants appealed to the District Judge, who, by desire of both the parties, referred the question as to the jurisdiction of the Court to the High Court under s. 617 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On this reference the following order was passed:—

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya and Babu Satish Chandar Mukerji for the appellants.

Mr. H. C. Niblett, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.—This is a reference from the District Judge of Jhansi. The plaintiff is a resident of Gwalior² and a subject of that State. The defendant is a subject of Her Majesty the Queen, living within the jurisdiction of the Court of the District Judge of Jhansi. The plaintiff brought the suit in which this reference is made for a decree for rent which had accrued due in respect of land let by the plaintiff to the defendant in Gwalior territory. The District Judge desires to be instructed as to whether or not the suit is maintainable in British territory.

The suit being one for rent which had accrued due, and the parties being the parties between whom the contract was made for the letting and for the payment of rent, the suit, in our opinion, lay in the Jhansi Court, within the jurisdiction of which the defendant was living. A suit for rent as between lessor and lessee, whether the lease is determined or not, and a suit for the use and occupation [452] of land, was not treated in England as a suit having a local venue. See, article "Action" in volume 1 of Tomlin's Law Dictionary. The case would consequently come within the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gurdyal Singh v. The Raja of Faridkot (1). With this reply the record will be returned to the District Judge.

A plaintiff brought his suit in a Civil Court alleging that he was entitled to the possession of certain land as a tenant at fixed rates, and that in consequence of the order of a settlement officer he had been dispossessed by certain persons, alleged by him to be trespassers without title, whom he made defendants together with the zamindar of the land in dispute.

Held that, inasmuch as the plaintiff could under the circumstances indicated in his plaint have obtained no relief from a Court of Revenue, the Civil Court was competent to entertain the suit and to give the plaintiff a decree for possession as against the defendants, other than the zamindar, who were found to be trespassers, notwithstanding that the Civil Court could not declare what was the nature of the plaintiff's tenancy. *Tarapat Ojha v. THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Mr. J. E. Howard, for the appellants.

Mr. B. E. O'Connor, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—In this suit the plaintiff claimed a declaration that he was a tenant at fixed rates and he claimed possession. The defendants to the suit parties No. 1 claim possession as the occupancy tenants, and others of the defendants claim title under them, and one defendant was the zamindar.

[453] It appears that at and prior to the time of the revision of the settlement the plaintiff's name was entered in respect of the holding as a tenant at fixed rates. The plaintiff was at that time a minor under the guardianship of his aunt. The settlement officer subsequently in the course of the settlement entered in the record of the revision of settlement the defendants parties No. 1 as the tenants at fixed rates of the holding. The Subordinate Judge dismissed the plaintiff's suit. The District Judge in appeal found that the plaintiff was the tenant at fixed rates of the holding, that the defendants No. 1 and those claiming through them had no title, that the defendants No. 1 were trespassers, and gave the plaintiff a declaratory decree and a decree for possession. The defendants other than the zamindar have brought this appeal.

This is one of the class of cases which give the utmost difficulty to Civil Courts. Here is a case in which a thoroughly competent District Judge has found every material fact in favour of the plaintiff. He has found that the plaintiff is entitled to possession and that the defendants

No. 1 and those claiming under them have no title whatever. It is a case in which the plaintiff during his minority when he was under the guardianship of his aunt, with only her to protect his interest, was despoiled by the defendants No. 1.

The question before us is one as to the jurisdiction of the Civil Court to entertain the suit. Before deciding that question let us see what remedy the plaintiff entitled to possession would have in a Court of Revenue. He would in this case in our opinion have absolutely no remedy in a Court of Revenue. The defendants No. 1 are not his tenants, therefore he could not bring ejectment in a Court of Revenue. The plaintiff was not dispossessed by the zamindar or by any one having any title under the zamindar, consequently s. 95, cl. (n) of Act No. XII of 1881 would not apply. So far as we can see, if the plaintiff is confined to a Court of Revenue for his remedy, the Court of Revenue can afford him no remedy whatever. It could not have been in the [454] contemplation of the Legislature when they created Courts of Revenue and Civil Courts that a man who was entitled to possession as against a trespasser, who was not his landlord, and who had no title through his landlord, should be left for ever out of possession and without any remedy. That consideration in our opinion points strongly to the conclusion that the Civil Court had in this case jurisdiction to give the plaintiff a decree for possession. When we turn to s. 64 of Act No. XIX of 1873 we find that when a Settlement Officer makes an entry in the settlement record on the basis of possession of the claimant, the section provides that "all persons not in possession, but claiming the right to be so, shall be referred by him to the proper Court." The inference from that is that in such cases the Settlement Officer is not the proper Court, and some other Court must be intended. The Court of Revenue might be intended where s. 95, cl. (n) applied. Presumably the Civil Court must be intended where the Court of Revenue can afford no relief.

It was contended strongly by Mr. Howard that the Full Bench ruling in Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai (1), governed this case. He also referred to the Full Bench ruling in Tarapat Ojha v. Ram Ratan (2). The latter case has no bearing on the case now before us, for in that case s. 95, cl. (n) of Act No. XII of 1881 applied and the Court of Revenue could grant a remedy. The former case, that of Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai, is much nearer the case which is now before us. The case before the Full Bench was one in which the plaintiffs claimed a declaration that they were entitled as tenants at fixed rates, and they claimed to have the entries made at the recent settlement invalidated. The Civil Court could not invalidate the entries at a settlement, and it was clearly decided in that case that a Civil Court cannot give any decree declaring or deciding the status of an agricultural tenant. So far as that case applies here, it shows, and we agree with it, that the plaintiff's suit, so far as it claims any declaration as to his status, must be dismissed.

[455] It is incompetent to a Civil Court to make any declaration whatsoever as to the status of a tenant of an agricultural holding. We do not think, however, that the Full Bench ruling in Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai precludes us from giving a simple decree for possession to the plaintiff, who has proved his right to possession as against the defendants No. 1 and those claiming under them, and who has proved his case that he is the person entitled to the possession and that the defendants No. I and those claiming under them are simple trespassers.

(1) 18 A. 940.

(2) 15 A. 387.

We may observe that there is here no question between the plaintiff and the zamindar, although the zamindar was a defendant to the suit. The zamindar put in his written statement and alleged that the plaintiff was his tenant, and that the defendants No. I and those claiming under them had no title whatsoever.

We must say that we have had very considerable difficulty in dealing with this case and in seeing our way to giving the plaintiff his relief to the extent indicated. Mr. O'Connor has satisfied us that maintaining the decree below, so far as it is one simply for possession, we are not acting in conflict with the ruling of the Full Bench in Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai. He has also satisfied us that we are bound, on the findings of the District Judge, to maintain to that extent the judgment of the District Judge, as otherwise the plaintiff entitled to possession would have no remedy, the Court of Revenue being incompetent under the circumstances of the case to put him in possession.

We allow the appeal to the extent that we vary the decree of the lower appellate Court by making it simply a decree for possession to be delivered to the plaintiff as against all the defendants except the zamindar. As the plaintiff has substantially succeeded in this appeal, we allow him two-thirds of the costs of this appeal and of the suit. The defendants appellants will have one-third of the costs of this appeal and of the suit.

Act No. XII of 1881 (North-Western Provinces Rent Act), s. 95, cls. (m) and (n)—
"Wrongful dispossession"—Dispossession by process of law—Suit to recover damages for such dispossession—Civil and Revenue Courts—Jurisdiction.

The expressions "wrongful dispossession" in cl. (m) and "wrongfully dispossessed" in cl. (n) of s. 95 of Act No. XII of 1881, do not include a dispossession by order of Court, though such order may be subsequently reversed on appeal. Where therefore a tenant who is evicted under s. 36 and the following sections of the Rent Act, but afterwards reinstated by order of a superior Court of Revenue, sues the evicting zamindar for damages, such a suit may be brought in a Civil Court Sawai Ram v. Gir Prasad Singh (1) and Dhundu Bhagat v. Lalji Pande (2) referred to.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of Aikman, J. Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellant.

his holding under the provisions of s. 36 of the Rent Act. The tenant thereon presented an application under the provisions of s. 39 of that Act, contesting his liability to be ejected. The question was determined by the Assistant Collector adversely to the tenant, and the Assistant Collector's decision was upheld on appeal by the Commissioner. On the 18th of November, 1893, the Board of Revenue set aside the orders of the subordinate Courts of Revenue, and held that the plaintiff was a tenant with right of occupancy, and that the notice of ejectment was invalid. Meanwhile the landholder had taken proceedings under s. 40 of the Rent Act, and caused the plaintiff to be ejected from his holding on the 24th of September, 1892. After the plaintiff had won his case in the Board of Revenue, he applied to [457] be replaced in possession of his holding, and he obtained possession on the 17th of February, 1894. He brought the present suit in the Civil Court for the recovery of compensation for the period during which he had been out of possession of his holding. He obtained a decree from the Subordinate Judge, but on appeal the District Judge of Banda set aside this decree and dismissed the plaintiff's suit, holding that the plaintiff's remedy was an application under cl. (m) of s. 95 of the Rent Act, and that therefore the Civil Court had no jurisdiction. The learned District Judge relied on a decision of the Board of Revenue in Khresuri v. Maharaja Partab Narain Singh, No. 4 of the Selected Decisions of the Board of Revenue for 1892. That case arose under the Oudh Rent Act, which materially differs from Act No. XII of 1881, inasmuch as sub-s. (2) of s. 60 of the Oudh Act reserves to the tenant a right to institute a suit against his landlord to recover compensation for illegal ejectment under sub-s. (1) of that section. Sub-s. (1) corresponds to s. 40 of Act No. XII of 1881, but the latter section contains no provision at all corresponding to the provisions of sub-s. (2) of s. 60 of the Oudh Rent Act: the ruling therefore upon which the lower appellate Court relies, has no bearing upon the present case.

The question for decision in this appeal is whether a dispossession by process of Court can be considered to be a "wrongful dispossession" within the meaning of cl. (m) of s. 95. In my opinion it cannot be so considered. This was held in a previous decision of the Board of Revenue in Dhundu Bhagat v. Lalji Pande (1). In Sawai Ram v. Gir Prasad Singh (2) it was held by this Court that where an occupancy tenant had been dispossessed by a Civil Court and had afterwards been reinstated, this dispossession was not a wrongful dispossession within the meaning of cls. (m) and (n) of s. 95. Clause (m) provides for an application for compensation for wrongful dispossession; the next cl. (n) refers to an application for the [458] recovery of the occupancy of any land of which a tenant has been wrongfully dispossessed. I think the expressions "wrongful dispossession" in cl. (m) and "wrongfully dispossessed" must be read in the same sense, and in my opinion no application could be entertained under cl. (n) to recover possession of land from which a tenant had been dispossessed by order of Court. Another consideration which leads me to the same view is the short period of limitation provided by cl. (e) of s. 96, for applications under cls. (m) and (n) of s. 95. Clause (e) of s. 96 declares that such applications shall not be brought after six months from the date of the wrongful dispossession. In the present instance, the plaintiff was dispossessed on the 24th September, 1892, and it was not until upwards of a year afterwards that the Board of Revenue declared that he ought not to have been ousted from his holding. If his remedy therefore was by an application under cl. (m) and not by a suit in the Civil Court, he would in the present case have no redress. For the above reasons I am of opinion that the decision of the lower appellate Court was wrong. I allow this appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, remand the case under the provisions of s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure with directions to the District Judge to restore the appeal to his file of pending appeals and proceed to dispose of it on the merits, as raised in the other grounds in the memorandum of appeal to his Court. The appellant will have his costs in this Court in any event.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—This appeal is filed under the Letters Patent from the decree of our brother Knox granting probate of the will of Musammât Saudamani Dasi, who died on the 14th of July, 1890. The application for probate was filed in the Court of the District Judge of Benares. Two persons—Birj Nath De and Hem Chandar De—appeared and opposed. They opposed, according to their written statement, on the ground that the will in question had not been executed by Musammât Saudamani Dasi and that she had no disposing power over the property, or some of it, dealt with by the will. The District Judge found that the execution of the will was not proved. On appeal to this Court our brother Knox found that execution was proved. The appellants before us are the objectors. The questions raised before us here are, first, whether the will was actually executed, and, secondly, as to whether Musammat Saudamani Dasi had power to dispose of the property mentioned in the will.

In our opinion the due execution of the will is clearly proved. It is true that the will is not before us, but that is not the fault of the applicant for probate. The will has been made away with by other parties for whose action the applicant for probate is not responsible. The original will was registered in the Sub-Registrar's office at Benares. A Commissioner was duly appointed to [460] obtain an acknowledgment of execution from Musammat Saudamani Dasi, and she, having been identified, admitted execution of the will, and on that the will was registered. It is not suggested here that the officer in question did not act strictly in accordance with law. It is not suggested that on the occasion of his going to Musammat Saudamani Dasi's house that lady was personated by some one else. However, the execution of the will does not rest there. Two ladies were called, and we believe their evidence on this point, and they say that they were present when the will was executed by Musammat Saudamani Dasi. Another person was called; he witnessed the will. He apparently makes a living by letting himself out as a witness to the execution of documents. We see no reason to disbelieve him. Although the District Judge of Benares found that the execution of the will was not proved, he found that some such will had been executed. We find that the will was duly executed by Saudamani Dasi. The other witness to the will is dead. There was no issue before us of undue influence, or want of testamentary capacity or fraud or revocation.

As to the second point. It has been contended by Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji for the appellants that where an application for probate of a will is contested and it is alleged that the property dealt with by the will was not the testator's or was not property over which the testator had a power of testamentary disposal, it is the duty of the Court to try an issue raising this question. All we can say is that it would be exceedingly inconvenient if Courts in this country had to try such issues. A Court could never be quite sure that it had got the proper parties before it. It would be difficult always to be sure that there was not collusion in the case. It is much safer in the interests of the public that issues as to the title to property should be decided when the issues are raised in a regular suit, and not on an application for a grant of probate.

Mr. Banerji contends that according to the practice in England and the practice in India, we should try these questions [461] as to title. In support of his contention as to the practice in England he relies on the decision in Tharp v. Macdonald. In the goods of Tharp (1). That was a case in which the probate of the will of a married woman was opposed by her husband; and the case turned on this, that a married woman had in England no testamentary power unless she was possessed of separate property. Accordingly it was necessary to ascertain whether the testatrix in that case was possessed of any separate property so as to give her a title to make a will. It is obvious from the judgment of Sir George Jessel that the inquiry was merely one to ascertain the testamentary capacity of the lady, that is, whether she had any property which gave her the right to make a will. It was the possession of separate property which removed the legal incapacity under which she would have been so far as the making of a will was concerned. Sir George Jessel pointed out that it was not necessary to ascertain whether all the personal property mentioned in the will was property over which she had a power of disposal by will. It is obvious that if Mr. Banerji's proposition were well founded in law, a Court in India would have to go on and find as to the title to every bit of property dealt with by the will, the title to which was questioned by the objector.

Mr. Banerji has also relied for the practice in this country on Annoda Sundari Dasi v. Jugutmani Debi (1). Where Sir Louis Jackson in that case said:—"It appears to me that every consideration which ought to induce the Court to refuse probate of such a will must be taken into account,"—he had not in his mind any such question as a dispute as to the right to the property mentioned in the will. The illustration which he gives of what he means puts that beyond all doubt. The illustration was a case of undue influence.

That it is not the practice of the Courts in India, so far as we are aware, to try questions of title and finally decide them on applications for grant of probate or letters of administration, may be inferred from the following cases:—Behary Lall Sandyal [462] v. Juggo Mohun Gossain (2), Hormusji Navroji v. Bai Dhanbaiji, Jamsetji Dosabhai (3), Arunamoyi Dasi v. Mohendra Nath Wadadar (4) and Barot Parshotam Kallu v. Bai Muli (5). In our opinion the view of the law expressed in those cases is correct. In this Court our brother Burkitt in an unreported case has decided that questions of the title of the testator or intestate to property are not to be dealt with in applications for probate or letters of administration.

We accordingly decline to express any opinion as to whether the testatrix had a disposing power over the property, or any of it, mentioned in her will. The contention in the first Court could hardly have been seriously put forward, as the objectors called no evidence to support it. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.—This was a suit for contribution. It arose in this way. The plaintiff in a former suit, to which the appellant here was an original defendant, sought possession of a mandi and a house. The plaintiff here, in that suit a defendant, defended as to all the property claimed : as to part alleging that he was a tenant who had not received notice ; as to the rest entirely denying the title of the plaintiff to that suit. The defendants here, we suppose, being desirous of embroiling themselves in litigation, got themselves made defendants, and they also claimed the mandi, but made no claim to the house. In the result the plaintiff in the former suit recovered as against this plaintiff most of what he claimed, and got a decree as against the defendants here. The decree, so far as costs were concerned, decreed costs jointly against the defendants. This plaintiff paid all those costs and now seeks by this suit to compel his co-defendants in the former suit to contribute to the costs which were paid to the plaintiff in that suit. The first Court dismissed the claim. The District Judge of Allahabad, relying on the decision in Kristo Chunder Chatterjee v. J. P. Wise (1), dismissed the appeal. From that decree this appeal has been brought.

It appears to us that it lay upon the plaintiff here to show that there was either some contract between him and the defendants, or some equity which created a duty on these defendants to contribute to the costs in question as between themselves. Apparently the plaintiff and defendants here were wrong-doers. They were holding on to property to which the plaintiff in the former suit was entitled, and to which they (or either or any of them) were not entitled. Each was acting independently and for his own benefit, and setting up a title against the plaintiff to the former suit which [464] was independent of, and separate from, and inconsistent with, the title set up by the other defendants. Their claims were mutually exclusive. There was no contract between them. One was not acting as the servant of the other ; and there was no equity between these persons, whose cases were antagonistic to each other.

It appears to us that the principle upon which Kristo Chunder Chatterjee v. Wise (1) and Sreeputty Roy v. Loharam Roy (2) were decided is the correct principle to apply in this case. It is the principle which we believe the Privy Council would have applied ; at least so we conclude from the judgment of their Lordships in Abdul Wahid Khan v. Shaluka Bibi (3). That there may in some events be contribution between wrong-doers is shown from the judgment in Suput Singh v. Imrit Tewari (4). No facts were alleged or proved here, and no facts existed, which would entitle the plaintiff to obtain contribution from the defendants in respect of these costs.

We dismiss this appeal with costs.

It is quite clear from s. 9 of Act No I of 1878 that the Court of Session has no jurisdiction in the matter. The [466] conviction, if there is one, must be before a Magistrate, for a Magistrate, and not the Judge of the Court of Session, is the person empowered to pass sentence. Similar questions arose in Indrobeer Thaba (1) and Regina v. Donoghue (2). It is probable that the Magistrate who took cognizance of the case has not power to award a sufficient punishment in case these men are proved to be guilty of the offence. As to whether or not these men, or either of them, are guilty, we express no opinion. We set aside the order of commitment, the result of which is that the case goes back to the Court of the Magistrate who made the order of commitment, and we transfer the case from the Court of that Magistrate to the Court of the District Magistrate of Allahabad. As to the question whether these men should be tried separately or together, that the Magistrate must decide. THIS was a suit for possession of a house by right of pre-emption according to the Muhammadan law. The claim was based upon the allegation that the house sold was situated in the same lane as the plaintiff's house, the lane being in the joint user of the plaintiff and the vendors. The plaintiff alleged compliance in the usual manner with the necessary formalities required by Muhammadan law. The vendees defendants resisted the claim principally on the ground that they also had a house situated in the same common lane; that they thereby were possessed of equal rights of pre-emption with the plaintiff, and that, as the sale had been completed in their favour, the plaintiff's suit could not succeed as against them.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Koel) accepted this plea of the defendants vendees and dismissed the suit.

The plaintiff appealed, and the Lower Appellate Court (District Judge of Aligarh) dismissed the appeal, also holding that inasmuch as the vendees themselves had an equal right of pre-emption, by reason of participation in the common lane, with the plaintiff, the plaintiff's claim could not be supported as against them.

The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

[468] BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for pre-emption under the Muhammadan law. The property claimed is a house situated in a blind lane, and the plaintiff claims pre-emption as a partner in the appendages of the house. It has been found by the Courts below that the vendees own houses in the same lane and would themselves have the right equally with the plaintiff to pre-empt the property against a stranger. Those Courts have held that the plaintiff has no preferential right of pre-emption and is not entitled to a decree, and they have accordingly dismissed the claim.

It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, who has preferred this appeal, that the Muhammadan law does not require that the claimant for pre-emption should have a preferential right, and that under that law, if the vendee and the pre-emptor have equal rights of pre-emption as against an outsider, the property should be divided between them in the same way in which it would have been divided between them had the vendee been a stranger and both of them had claimed pre-emption against him. The contention is that the rule laid down in Book, XXXVIII, Chapter I, of the Hedaya (Vol. III, p. 566) that "when there is a plurality of persons entitled to the privilege of shaffa the right of all is equal" is as much applicable when the purchaser is a person having the right of pre-emption as when he is a stranger. The question thus raised is by no means an easy one, and has not, as far as we are aware, been decided by this Court. There are, however, three rulings of the Calcutta High Court which support the view of the learned Judge of the Court below.

In Baboo Moheshee Lal v. Mr. G. Christian (1) Bayley and Shumbhoo Nath Pundit, JJ., held that the right of pre-emption "could, under Muhammadan law only, be against strangers or third parties not co-parceners." In Teeka Dharee Singh v. Mohur Singh (2) the same learned Judges observed that "the very fact of the purchaser not being a stranger, but one who is already either a shareholder or a neighbour, proves that the Muhammadan [469] law of pre-emption never intended to apply to such a case." It is difficult to follow the reasoning of the learned Judges in the case last mentioned, but in neither of the two cases have they referred to any authority of Muhammadan law as supporting their view.

The case of Lalla Nowbut Lall v. Lalla Jewan Lall (1) was decided by a Full Bench, which held that "by the Muhammadan law one coparcener has no right of pre-emption as against another co-parcener." The learned Chief Justice in delivering the judgment of the Court said:—"There appears to be no reason, either upon principle or authority, why the right of shaffa should exist as between co-parceners, and the rule as laid down in Hamilton's Hedaya, Vol. III, Book 38, Ch. I, appears to have been misunderstood in this respect. That rule merely prescribes that any one partner (or co-parcener) of a property has a right of shaffa as against a stranger who purchases a share from his co-partner, and does not mean that the right exists as between co-partners who may purchase shares from one another. The object of the rule, as explained in that chapter, and in Ch. 3, is to prevent the inconvenience which may result to families and communities from the introduction of a disagreeable stranger as a co-parcener or near neighbour. But it is obvious that no such annoyance can result from a sale by one co-parcener to another. The only result of such a sale would be to give the purchaser a larger share in the joint property than he had before, and perhaps larger than the other co-parceners have." No other authorities were cited in the judgment.

In Mr. Justice Ameer Ali's work on Muhammadan law it is stated, on p. 590 of Vol. I, that "when one co-sharer conveys his share to another co-sharer, no other co-sharer, if any, can have a right of pre-emption, the rights of all being equal, and the reason on which the right is founded, therefore, being absent. In other words, no right of pre-emption arises in favour of a co-parcener when the purchaser himself is a co-sharer of the vendor and the [470] claimant." The learned author evidently based his opinion on the rulings mentioned above as he has not referred to any authority of Muhammadan law which warrants it.

As, according to the Hedaya, the object is "to prevent the vexation arising from a disagreeable neighbour" (Vol. III, p. 591; Book XXXVIII, Chap. III), and as in the case of a purchase by a person who stands on the same footing as the claimant for pre-emption that object is non-existent, it would seem, were there no authority to the contrary, that the Muhammadan law sanctioned the enforcement of the right of pre-emption against a stranger only. But the texts from various authors who are regarded as high authorities on Muhammadan law cited by Mr. Karamat Husain, the learned counsel for the appellant, to whom we are much indebted for his erudite and exhaustive argument, leave no room for doubt that the right of pre-emption may, under that law, be enforced against a purchaser who is not a stranger, but is a person who could equally with the plaintiff have claimed pre-emption against a stranger, and that in the case of purchase by such a person the rights of other persons entitled to pre-empt the property should be determined in the manner in which they would have been determined had the person who purchased the property acquired it by pre-emption against a stranger purchaser in the absence of other pre-emptors, and the absentee pre-emptors had afterwards appeared and claimed their shares. It is settled law that where the vendee is a stranger and more persons than one have the right of pre-emption, and one of those persons is absent "decree is to be given to those who are present, according to their number. But if, after decree of the whole to one who is present, a second should appear, half is to be decreed to him, and if a third should appear, decree is to be given to him for a third of what is in the hands of each of the other two." (Baillie's Digest of Muhammadan law, 2nd ed., p. 501. See also Hedaya. Vol. III, p. 567 and Tagore Law Lectures for 1873, p. 519). According to the authorities cited to us by the learned counsel, to which we shall presently refer, the above rule applies and determines the right of [471] pre-emption, even when the purchaser is a pre-emptor, that is, a person who would have the pre-emptive right as against a stranger. It is in this sense that the word appears to have been used in the following texts of Muhammadan law which have been cited to us, and which seem to us to be conclusive on the point.

In the Takmila Bahr-ur-Raik (a) occurs a passage which has a direct bearing upon the question before us. It is thus translated:—"It is given in the Tatar Khaniyah that a neighbour purchased a house and there was another neighbour on the other side who claimed pre-emption; the house would be equally divided between the purchaser and the neighbour." The Bahr-ur-Raik is, according to Mr. Morley (Introduction to the Digest, p. CCLXX), the most famous commentary on the Kanz-ud-Dakaik, "a book of great reputation," and Mr. Justice Ameer Ali says of it that "it is highly thought of in Sunni countries" (Muhammadan Law, Vol. I, Introduction, p. 19). The Tatar Khaniyah is referred to on p. CCLXXXVII of the Introduction to Morley's Digest, and on pp. 52 and 53 of Shama Charan Sircar's Tagore Law Lectures for 1873.

The Radd-ul-Mukhtar, which Mr. Justice Ameer Ali says, "is certainly esteemed now-a-days as the best authority on Hanafi Law" (Muhammadan Law, Vol. I, Introduction, p. 21), and which, according to Mr. Shama Charan Sircar (p. 46) is "a very high authority among the Hanifis," quoting from Alqunyah says:—"A neighbour purchases a house while there is another neighbour to it. (If) the neighbour then demands pre-emption and the purchaser too, the house is to be divided between them half and half, for both of them are pre-emptors." (b). The author of the Radd-ul-Mukhtar says further:—"His words 'according to the number of the pre-emptors.' Because of their equality in the right for the whole owing to the existence of the cause of it, there ought to be equality in the juristic result. And this would include the case in which the purchaser should happen to be one of them and should demand (pre-emption) with them. He then would be calculated to be one of them and the property sold would be divided among them." (c).

In the well known work, the Fatawa Alamgiri, we have the following passages:—"If a person purchases a house of which he is a pre-emptor and then appears another pre-emptor [473] having an equal right with him, the Kazi (Judge) will pass a decree for one half." (d).

Again.—“If the first vendee is a pre-emptor of the house and the pre-emptor present purchases it from him, and then the absent pre-emptor appears, the last named pre-emptor can, if he likes, take half the house under the first sale.”

The Inayah or Aini, a commentary on the Hedaya, which, Mr. Morley says, “is much esteemed for its studious analysis and interpretation of the text” (Introduction, p. CCLXIX), contains the following passage:—“If the first purchaser is also a pre-emptor and the pre-emptor who is present also purchases it jointly with him and subsequently the absent pre-emptor [474] appears, he (the absent pre-emptor) can, if he likes, take half the house under the first sale.” (e)

The last authority, but by no means of the least weight, to which we will refer is the Durr-ul Mukhtar. It is, according to Mr. Justice Ameer Ali, “a work of great authority and merit.” (Mahomedan Law, Introduction, p. 20), and the learned author of the Tagore Law Lectures for 1873 refers to it as “a work of great celebrity” (p. 46). It says—“When two persons purchase a house and both are pre-emptors and then appears a third pre-emptor after division has been made under a decree or otherwise, he, that is, the pre-emptor, can have the division cancelled, because what was a half before, has now become one-third (Sharah wah-baniya)."(f)

[475] These texts, the authority of which has not been questioned by Mr. Abdul Majid on behalf of the respondents, establish, as we have said, two propositions; first, that even when the buyer is himself a pre-emptor, that is, a person who would have the right of pre-emption against an outsider, other persons having a similar right of pre-emption are entitled to claim pre-emption against the buyer; and, secondly, that in such a case the rights of the claimants to pre-emption should be determined in the same way in which they would have been determined, had the buyer acquired the property by enforcing his right of pre-emption against a stranger, in the absence of the other pre-emptors and the absentee pre-emptors had appeared subsequently and claimed pre-emption. In this view, as all persons having equal right of pre-emption are only entitled under the Muhammadan law to divide the property equally per capita, and as the purchasers in this case are two in number, the plaintiff appellant is entitled to only a third share of the property sold.

Mr. Abdul Majid, whilst conceding that this is so under strict Muhammadan law, contends that we should not apply the rules of Muhammadan law in their entirety to cases of pre-emption. He relies on the rulings of the Full Bench in Chundo v. Hakeem Alim-ood-deen (1) and Gobind Dayal v. Inayat-ul-lah (2) in which the majority of this Court held that the Court is not bound to administer the Muhammadan law in claims of pre-emption, but that, according to the rule of justice, equity and good conscience, [476] that law should be applied in cases of pre-emption. We, as a Division Bench, are bound by the opinion of the majority of the Full Bench, and, according to that opinion, to administer under the rule of justice, equity and good conscience the rules of Muhammadan law in cases of pre-emption. We do not think we should be justified in applying those rules in a mutilated form. and we are of opinion that in cases of pre-emption we should apply the Muhammadan law, where it is not inconsistent with the principles of justice, equity and good conscience. We are not satisfied that the rules deducible from the texts cited above are repugnant to those principles.

Mr. Abdul Majid's next contention is that the plaintiff does not seek to pre-empt the whole of the property sold and that his suit must fail for this reason. It is alleged that the house in question was sold by Musammats Ulfat and Imrat on the 28th of September, 1893, and that on the 29th of September, 1893, five persons conveyed to the same vendees what they stated to be their interests in the house. The plaintiff has claimed pre-emption in respect of the first sale only. It is argued that as he has not claimed to pre-empt the property comprised in both the sales, he has thereby forfeited his right of pre-emption. We are aware of no law which requires that a person entitled to the right of pre-emption is bound to claim pre-emption in respect of all the sales which may be executed in regard to the property. What the Muhammadan law enjoins is, as observed by Mahmood, J., in Kashi Nath v. Mukta Prasad, (1), that "every suit for pre-emption must include the whole of the property subject to pre-emption conveyed by one transfer." In this case the plaintiff has in his plaint claimed the whole of the property comprised in the sale deed of the 28th of September, 1893, and he has not split up that bargain. His claim, therefore, does not violate any rule of Muhammadan law. As, however, the vendees have equal rights of pre-emption with him and they are two in number, the plaintiff would be entitled to only a third share of the property [477] on payment of one-third of the sale price, provided that he has complied with all the requirements of Muhammadan law. In this case it was denied that he had made the preliminary demands, and it was asserted that the sale had taken place with his consent. There was also a dispute as to the actual amount of the sale price. These questions have not been decided by the lower appellate Court. As that Court dismissed the suit upon a preliminary point, and its decision upon that point is, in our opinion, erroneous, we set aside the decree below and remand the case to the lower appellate Court under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure with directions to re-admit it under its original number in the register and to dispose of it according to law. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BLAIR, J.—The question before us is as to whether execution of a decree for money in this case was barred [478] by limitation on the 19th of January, 1895, when an application, out of which this appeal has arisen, was made.

The decree-holder, or rather his heir, is appellant here. The decree-holder obtained his decree for money, and, under an application of the 9th of April, 1890, he, on the 20th of November, 1891, brought some property of the judgment-debtors (respondents here) to sale, and, having obtained leave to purchase, he purchased it himself. On the 21st of January, 1892, the sale was confirmed. On the 9th of February, 1892, he obtained a certificate of sale in respect of the sale to which we have referred. On the 29th of February, 1892, the decree-holder applied to the Court to be put in possession of the property which he had purchased. On the 21st of March, 1892, the decree-holder was put in possession by the Court. On the 6th of April, 1892, the decree-holder died and was succeeded by his minor son, appellant here, and on the 19th of January, 1895, the son filed the present application for execution of the decree. The Subordinate Judge of Aligarh dismissed the application, holding that the execution of the decree was barred by limitation.

In order to save limitation the appellant has relied upon the application for a certificate of sale of the 9th of February, 1892, and the application to be put into possession of the 29th of February, 1892. If the making of either of these applications by the decree-holder was the taking of a step-in-aid of execution of the decree, the application of the 19th of January, 1895, was within time.

* First Appeal No. 144 of 1895 from an order of Babu Bepin Bihari Mukerji, Officiating Subordinate Judge of Aligarh, dated the 6th May, 1895.

(1) 12 A. 399.

Now it has been held by this Court that an application by a decree-holder to obtain payment to him out of Court of purchase-money paid for the property of his judgment-debtor at a sale held under the decree-holder's decree was "taking a step-in-aid of execution" within the meaning of art. 179, paragraph 4, of the Limitation Act. That decision was approved of by the Full Bench of this Court in Sujan Singh v. Hira Singh (1). A proceeding in execution cannot be said to be completed (at least so [479] far as a decree-holder is concerned) in a case of sale until he has obtained the proceeds and benefit of the sale held in execution of his decree. Consequently it appears to us that an application to be paid out of Court the proceeds of such sale must be considered as the taking of a step-in-aid of the execution of the decree.

Now, apart from procedure, which does not assist us in ascertaining or applying principles of law, is there any difference between the case of a decree-holder applying to the Court to be paid out of Court the proceeds of a sale held in execution of his decree for money, and the case of a decree-holder, where he has himself purchased—consequently where no money passes—applying to the Court to be put in possession of that which represents money, which, if a third person had purchased, would have been paid into Court.

Mr. Ram Prasad, for the judgment-debtor, has contended that, inasmuch as the decree-holder, when he purchases, files in Court a receipt for so much of his judgment-debt as represents his purchase-money, he, on filing that receipt, must be treated as having received the purchase-money. The filing of the receipt is a mere matter of procedure, no money passes or is intended to pass, unless the purchase-money is in excess of the judgment-debt, and the execution of his decree cannot be said to be satisfied until in the one case he has received the purchase-money paid into Court, and in the other case until he be put into possession of the property of his judgment-debtor which he has purchased and which represents money, which, if a third person purchased, would have been paid into Court, and upon the decree-holder's application would have been paid out to him. We can see no difference between the two cases.

We hold that the application of the 19th January, 1895, to execute this decree was within time. We allow this appeal with costs, and we direct the Court below to proceed with the execution of the decree.

Appeal decreed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BLAIR, J.—One Badshah Begam had three children—Ikram Husain, Farhat Husain, and Bismillah Begam. Ikram Husain and Farhat Husain after Badshah Begam's death mortgaged a village which had belonged to Badshah Begam in her life-time, and which, unless something in the way of limitation happened, belonged to Ikram Husain, Farhat Husain and Bismillah Begam as heirs of Badshah Begam. The mortgagee brought a suit for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act against Ikram Husain and Farhat Husain, and got a decree directing that, in the event of the amount decreed not being paid, the village which had belonged to Badshah Begam should be sold. Farhat Husain died before the decree was executed, and thereupon his sister, Bismillah Begam, was brought into the proceedings as his representative. The village was sold, and Bismillah Begam brought this suit to obtain her one-fifth share of this village. The first Court dismissed the suit on the ground that s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure applied. [481] The second Court, holding that s. 244 did not apply, set aside the decree of the first Court and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code. From that order of remand this appeal has been brought.

It has been contended by Mr. Ram Prasad that Bismillah Begam's remedy was an objection to the sale under s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Calcutta High Court has held in Deefholts v. Peters (1) that s. 278 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply in execution of decrees for sale. Mr. Ram Prasad has relied on the judgment of this Court in Seth Chand Mal v. Durga Dei (2). We may say that, although we agree entirely with the judgment in that case, it cannot be applied here. If there is one point on which we believe there is general concurrence of opinion in the High Courts of India, it is that a Court executing a decree cannot take upon itself to alter or vary that decree. Its powers are confined to construing a decree when necessary and executing a decree in its terms so long as the law allows the decree to be executed. There is an essential difference between the execution of a decree for money by the sale of the property and the execution of a decree for sale of property specified in the decree. In the first case any third person can intervene in the execution of a decree and show that the decree could not be executed against particular property, if that property was not the property of the judgment-debtor, but was the property of the person opposing. Similarly in the case of a decree for money, where the judgment-debtor dies, his representative is entitled to oppose the execution of the decree against any particular property by showing that property was not the property of the judgment-debtor and was the property of the representative, as for example, that it was his self-acquired property. That course can be taken by a stranger or a representative in execution of a decree for money for this reason, that a decree for money is not based upon any adjudication that the particular property, or in fact any property, which may subsequently be brought to sale in execution of the [482] decree, was the property of the judgment-debtor, or property which would be liable to his debts. Consequently, when such objection is taken before the Court executing a decree for money, that Court has power to inquire into and decide on any such objection taken to the execution of the decree against any particular property. Where, however, the decree is a decree for sale under the Transfer of Property Act, the Court executing the decree must sell the property decreed to be sold and leave any one objecting to the execution of the decree against that particular property to such remedy as he may have by a suit or by resistance to the possession of the purchaser. For these reasons we are of opinion that the Court of first appeal was right and that s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not bar this suit.

(1) 14 C. 631.

(2) 12 A. 313.

We dismiss this appeal and affirm the decision of the Court [below with costs].*

Execution of decree—Civil Procedure Code, s. 276—Attachment—Effect upon maintenance of attachment of order dismissing application for execution.

Where property has once been attached in execution of a decree, an order merely dismissing an application for execution which order does not contain specific words withdrawing the attachment and which is not an order declaring the decree incapable of execution, will not have the effect of raising the attachment, and if in appeal such order is set aside, the decree holder will be in the same position as he was before and entitled to the full benefit of the attachment. *Gunga Rai v. [483] BURKITT, J. (KNOX, J., concurring).—This case is a very instructive illustration of the saying that a successful litigant's troubles commence when he tries to execute his decree, as we have here the case of a decree-holder who for more than eleven years has been unable to obtain the fruits of a decree in his favour.

The facts are as follows:—

One Sheo Bakhsh lent money to one Adhar Singh wherewith to pay the Government revenue due from him and to save his property from sale. No security was taken for the loan. The money not being repaid, Sheo Bakhsh sued Adhar Singh and obtained a money decree on the 24th April 1886 for some Rs. 9,642 odd. He took out execution in May 1887 by attaching two villages belonging to his judgment-debtor, namely, Atarra Mahal Ajit Singh and Bairipur, and asked that they should be sold and his decree paid off from the proceeds of the sale. His troubles then began. An objection to the attachment was made by Bijai Singh, son of the judgment-debtor. Bijai Singh claimed these villages as his property under a deed of gift, dated June 23rd, 1886, from his father, the judgment-debtor. The Court executing the decree allowed the objection and directed the attachment to be removed. That order was passed in May, 1888. The decree-holder thereupon instituted a suit against his judgment-debtor and against Bijai Singh, and on February 14th, 1889, he obtained a decree declaring that the two villages were liable to attachment and sale in execution of the decree of April 1886. An appeal was taken against the declaratory decree, but was dismissed by the High Court on January 28th, 1891. Meanwhile the decree-holder took prompt action on the decree of February 14th, 1889. He made an application on February 19th, 1889, to the execution Court, on the strength of that decree, asking for attachment and sale of the two villages. That application was granted, an attachment being levied on the two villages, on the 22nd June 1889. As the villages attached were ancestral property, the further execution of the decree was, on September 12th, 1889, transferred to the Collector under the rules framed by Government to give [484] effect to s. 320 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case, however, did not remain long in the Collector's Court. For on January 31st, 1890, as the decree-holder was unable to attend at his Court in camp in the interior of the district, the Deputy Collector, on whose file the execution case was pending, struck it off for default and returned the papers to the Subordinate Judge, who at once followed suit by striking the case off his pending files. This proceeding was quite unnecessary, as he had struck the case off his files when he sent it to the Collector in September. The decree-holder then made several ineffectual attempts to induce the Subordinate Judge to send back the case for further execution to the Collector. At last, on an application made in September, 1890, the Subordinate Judge directed the case to be again sent to the Collector for further execution. This order was made on November 19th, 1890. The result of this last order was in our opinion to restore the state of things which existed on September 12th, 1889, when the decree first was sent to the Collector for execution. There was no necessity for any further attachment. The orders of the Deputy Collector and of the Subordinate Judge striking the execution case off their files of pending cases did not dissolve the attachment which had been imposed in the previous June, 1889. No formal order was passed by either tribunal withdrawing the attachment, and the decree-holder certainly had neither asked for nor consented to such a withdrawal. In this opinion we are supported by the authority of many decided cases, e.g., Gunga Rai v. Mussumat Sakeena Begum (1), Nadir Hossein v. Pearoo Thovildarinee (2), Golam Yaheya v. Sham Soonduree Kooeree (3), &c. We may add also that as to this point no question was raised nor any argument addressed to us at the hearing of this appeal. With the retransfer of the execution case to the Collector the decree-holder's troubles did not come to an end. The judgment-debtor early in January 1891, put in a petition before the Subordinate Judge in which, on various tech-[485] nical grounds, he objected to the continuance of the execution proceedings before the Collector. That petition was rejected on technical grounds on April 17th, 1891. The judgment-debtor, however, persisted, and, on April 13th, 1891, he again put in a petition in which on technical grounds he contended that the decree was not capable of execution, and prayed that the decree-holder's application for execution might be disallowed. The Subordinate Judge thereupon went into the matter, and by order dated June 8th, 1891, held that the pending proceedings in execution could not be maintained, and disallowed the application for execution. The Subordinate Judge held that the application was barred under s. 158 of the Code of Civil Procedure by reason of the infructuous proceedings mentioned above, which took place between the orders of January 31st and November 19th, 1890.

The result of the decision of June 8th, 1891, was that the decree-holder's execution proceedings before the Collector came to an abrupt termination, and the papers were returned to the Subordinate Judge. So after the expiration of more than five years from the date of his decree the decree-holder, through no fault of his own, found himself no nearer getting the benefit of his decree than he had been in 1886. He, however, now appealed to the High Court against the order of June 1891 and prayed that Court to order execution of his decree to be proceeded with. The appeal was allowed by the High Court on December 15th, 1892, the order of the Subordinate Judge was set aside, and it was ordered that "the proceedings in execution will proceed." Thereupon the decree-holder again applied to the Subordinate Judge on the strength of the order of the High Court and the case was on his application, by order of March 3rd, 1894, again sent to the Collector for further execution. Even then the judgment-debtor was not satisfied. He again, on April 21st, 1894, applied to the execution Court objecting to the order for execution, and to the transfer of the proceedings to the Collector. It is not necessary to notice the reasons he gave for his objection. Here the appellant [486] Bank for the first time came on the scene. It also, on May 4th, 1894, practically supported the objections made by the judgment-debtor and called on the Court to compel the decree-holder to attach anew and to notify the terms of a mortgage it held from the judgment-debtor. Both objections were overruled by the Court, and an appeal to the High Court was dismissed in June 1896.

But meanwhile, i.e., between the orders of June 8th, 1891, and of December 15th, 1892, the case had entered into a new phase. On the 4th of January, 1892, the judgment-debtor, jointly with his son, Bijai Singh, borrowed Rs. 30,000 from the Bank of Upper India and, as security for the repayment of the loan, mortgaged six villages, among which are the two villages Atarra Mahal Ajit Singh and Bairipur which the decree-holder Sheo Bakhsh had attached on June 22nd, 1889, in execution of his decree, and in respect of which the execution proceedings had been twice transferred to the Collector. Hence the present suit, in which the plaintiff Bank seeks to enforce its mortgage by sale of all the mortgaged villages. The persons impleaded as defendants are Adhar and his son (who have not appeared) and the five sons of Sheo Bakhsh, the decree-holder referred to above, now deceased. The lower Court gave the Bank a decree for recovery of the loan by the sale of the mortgaged property, with the exception of Atarra Mahal Ajit Singh and Bairipur. It held that, as these villages were under attachment to satisfy the decree held by Sheo Bakhsh's sons, the Bank could not bring them to sale unless it paid off that decree. The Bank appeals, contending that it is entitled to a decree for sale of the two villages just mentioned.

In the memorandum of appeal the Bank refers to what it calls a "finding" by the Subordinate Judge that Sheo Bakhsh was a consenting party to the mortgage of January, 1892. We are unable to discover any such "finding" on the record. The Subordinate Judge in that which he calls "a short account of the case," but which clearly is no more than a historical resume of [487] the case of each party, does say that "Sheo Bakhsh having joined the executants expressed his consent to the contents of the document." It is impossible to say where the Subordinate Judge got that statement. It is not mentioned in the plaint, nor referred to in the written statement, nor was it put in issue. Neither Adhar nor Bijai Singh put in an appearance, so the statement could not have been made by them, and the present respondents certainly did not make any such admission and do not admit it now. The Bank's mortgage deed also contains no assent whatever by Sheo Bakhsh nor any mention of his name; the only parties to it are the Bank, Bijai and Adhar. Probably the fact was asserted by the Bank's pleader when stating his case in the lower Court, and that would explain why—no evidence being produced to support it—the Subordinate Judge made no mention of it in his judgment. It is too large a draft on our credulity to ask us to believe that Sheo Bakhsh, who for years had been straining every nerve to obtain execution of his decree, and whose appeal was then pending in the High Court, could have taken such a fatal step as to assent to the mortgage of January 4th, 1892. We notice that in its judgment of January 28th, 1891, referred to above, the High Court treated with contempt a similar plea that Sheo Bakhsh had consented to the deed of gift.

Passing away from that matter, we have now to decide whether the appellant Bank is entitled to a decree for sale of the two villages under its mortgage, or whether the respondents have a prior lien. The Subordinate Judge has found in favour of the respondents. In our opinion his decision is right. The declaratory decree given by the Subordinate Judge on February 14th, 1889 (affirmed by the High Court on January 28th, 1891), decided finally that the two villages were liable to sale in execution of Sheo Bakhsh's decree, and that decree bound not merely Adhar and Bijai, but also their mortgagee the Bank, which claims title through them. It has been held by some authorities that the decree of February 14th, 1889, had the effect of restoring the attachment which had been removed on May 12th, 1888. It is [488] unnecessary to decide that point, as the two villages were again duly attached on June 22nd, 1889, and undoubtedly remained subject to that attachment at least up to June 8th, 1891, the date on which the Subordinate Judge disallowed the then pending application for execution, wrongly holding that that application was barred under s. 158 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Now it is in our opinion very doubtful whether that order had the effect of dissolving the attachment. The order did not formally withdraw the attachment, nor did it declare (as was incorrectly stated at the hearing of this appeal) that the decree was incapable of execution. It did no more than lay down that execution should not be allowed on that particular application. But if it be the case that the effect of that order was to dissolve the attachment, we are of opinion that the effect of the order of the High Court in appeal (December 15th, 1892) was to wipe out the order of June 8th, 1891, and to re-establish the position of the parties as it stood before that order was made. The argument for the appellant Bank is that the effect of the order of the High Court was to send the decree-holder back to the Subordinate Judge with a bare money decree in his hands, deprived of the security he had obtained by the attachment in June, 1889, and of the benefit of the protection given by s. 276 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In short, it is contended that the only course open to this decree-holder, on succeeding in his appeal in the High Court, and on obtaining from that Court an order that the proceedings in execution should proceed, was to apply again for attachment and sale and to begin de novo, subject to any alienation which his judgment-debtor might have made in the interval between the two orders. Admittedly the decree-holder was in no way in fault. It was the Subordinate Judge who made a wrong order, and, if the contention for the appellant be correct, the effect of that wrong order is to damnify the unfortunate decree-holder most disastrously by enabling Adhar successfully to swindle his creditor. We are unable to believe that the law can be as contended for by the appellant Bank. We are of opinion that when the High Court [489] set aside the wrong order of the Subordinate Judge, it set it aside to the fullest extent, and that, if the effect of that order was to dissolve the attachment, the effect of the appellate order was to cancel that portion also of the Subordinate Judge's order. We fail to see why we should hold that that portion of the order was not affected by the appellate decree. We hold, therefore, that the two villages in dispute in this appeal were at the date of the appellant Bank's mortgage lying under a duly perfected and existent attachment in execution of Sheo Bakhsh's decree, and that under the provision of s. 276 of the Code of Civil Procedure the Bank's mortgage is void against any claims enforceable under that attachment, and therefore void against the decree held by the respondents.

It also was contended that the Bank's mortgage would, under the provision of s. 52 of the Transfer of Property Act, be inoperative as against the respondent's decree on the ground that the mortgage was entered into during the active prosecution of a contentious proceeding in which the right to sell the dispute villages was directly and specifically in question. We, however, consider it to be unnecessary to express any opinion on that question.

For the reasons given above we are of opinion that this appeal fails. We therefore dismiss it with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J. (KNOX, J., concurring).—This is an appeal by the defendant in the suit from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Benares, dated the 22nd of August 1895.

The claim was for the recovery of Rs. 6,500 from the defendant. The plaintiff puts his case as follows:—He says that the defendant held a decree (No. 163 of 1892) against two persons named Sundar Das and Baij Nath Prasad; that the plaintiff, being related to Sundar Das, desired to purchase the decree in order to help him; that he entered into a contract with the defendant to purchase the decree, agreeing to pay any "miscellaneous expenses" which the defendant had incurred in obtaining the decree in addition to the amount secured by the decree, costs, &c., and that he sent to the defendant Rs. 6,500 as a deposit and in part payment of the consideration money. The plaintiff then goes on to allege that the defendant sent to the plaintiff two written drafts (one of a sale-deed and the other of an agreement); that the plaintiff refused to execute the agreement as he had not contracted to execute such a document; that he called on the defendant to send him a detail of the miscellaneous charges, but that the defendant insisted on the execution of the draft agreement, and neither completed the sale-deed nor sent the detail of "miscellaneous charges," but in breach of his contract put the decree into execution and realized the amount due on it. Finally, the plaintiff alleged that the defendant refused to return the Rs. 6,500. He accordingly instituted this suit to recover that amount with interest, costs, &c.

The defendant in reply contended that he had not broken the contract, and asserted that it was the plaintiff who was in fault by not having paid up in proper time the balance of the purchase money and the miscellaneous charges, which he put at Rs. 2,000, though the defendant at the plaintiff's request had had the sale of [491] Sundar Das' property under his decree postponed. He denied that he had ever sent any draft agreement to the plaintiff or had asked him to execute such a document, but asserted that he had sent a draft sale-deed to the plaintiff in which Rs. 2,000 were entered as being payable on account of the "miscellaneous charges." The written statement of defence further alleged that defendant had sustained a loss of Rs. 2,000 by the non-completion of the contract, and in its last paragraph there is a plea that as the plaintiff was the person who broke the contract a suit by him was not maintainable.

The Subordinate Judge found on every issue in favour of the plaintiff and gave him a decree in full. The defendant appeals.

The only really important issue in this case is which side was guilty of the breach of contract.

[After a discussion of the facts of the case, the Court, differing from the Court of first instance, found that the contract to purchase had been broken by the plaintiff. The judgment then continued:—

The question now remains what decree should be passed in this appeal. If the defendant had persevered in the last plea set forth in his written statement, we should unhesitatingly have dismissed the suit. On our finding that the plaintiff was the person who broke the contract, we are of opinion that the plaintiff was not competent to sue to recover the deposit. In the case of Ex parte Barrell, in re Parnell (1) it was held that where a contract for sale goes off by default of the purchaser the vendor is entitled to retain the deposit, Lord Justice James remarking that "the money was paid to the vendor as a guarantee that the contract should be performed: the trustee refuses to perform the contract and then says—'Give me back the deposit;'—there is no ground for such a claim." And in the same case Lord Justice Mellish is reported to have said:—"It appears to me clear that, even where there is no clause in the contract as to forfeiture of the deposit, if the purchaser repudiate the contract he cannot have [492] back the money, as the contract has gone off through his default." That case was cited with approval in the later case of Howe v. Smith (2), in which it was held by the Lords Justices Cotton, Bowen and Fry that a "deposit, although to be taken as part payment if the contract was completed, was also a guarantee for the performance of the contract, and that the plaintiff having failed to perform the contract within a reasonable time had no right to a return of the deposit." Following the rule of law laid down in the above cited cases, we hold that the plaintiff, having broken his contract to purchase, had no right to a return of the deposit, and that the Subordinate Judge ought to have given effect to the last plea in the written statement of defence by dismissing the suit. In this appeal, however, the defendant appellant has not stood on his strict legal rights. He says he is willing to pay Rs. 4,500 to the plaintiff, and in the Court below, he called evidence, which we believe to be true, to show that he had tendered Rs. 4,500 to the plaintiff, who refused to accept it on the ground that he was entitled to the full Rs. 6,500. In this appeal the defendant appellant has contented himself with contesting the decree as to Rs. 2,000 and as to interest and costs. Had the appellant appealed against the whole decree, we most certainly should have dismissed the suit. But, as matters stand, the decree we pass is that we allow this appeal, that we strike Rs. 2,000

[493] REVISIONAL CRIMINAL.

Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Blair.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. RAM CHANDAR.* [18th May, 1897.]

Evidence—Presumption—Municipal bye-law, presumption as to the validity of Act No. XV of 1883 (North-Western Provinces and Oudh Municipalities Act), s. 55.

Where a person was tried for and convicted of a breach of certain bye-laws purporting to have been duly passed by a Municipal Board, it was held that the presumption was that such bye-laws had been passed with due regard to the necessary procedure and were not illegal, and that it lay upon the accused to object to their validity and was no part of the duty of a Court exercising appellate or revisional jurisdiction to enter of its own motion into the question whether such rules had been properly framed in accordance with the provisions of the law on that subject. The Municipality of Sholapur v. The Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company (1) referred to.

[R., 7 O.C. 51 (55).]

THIS was a reference made under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the Sessions Judge of Bareilly. The facts of the case will appear from the order of reference which was as follows:—

"This is an application for revision of an order made by the Joint Magistrate of Bareilly and purporting to have been made under ss 1 and 4 of Act No. XV of 1883. The case was sent back in order that the offence proved might be indicated, as required by s. 263 (f) of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and it was pointed out that the sections named were not penal sections. On the proceedings received back the authorities quoted are s. 1 (2), Chapter I, and s. 4, Chapter III of the rules passed by the Municipal Board of Bareilly under s. 55 (3) of Act No. XV of 1883. Upon this the parties were heard and the following order was made:— 'Inasmuch as it appears that the bye-law under which the conviction under revision was made and the punishment inflicted is not forthcoming, it is ordered that a precept issue to the District Magistrate to send to this Court a copy of the rules made under s. 55 (1) and of any direction made under s. 55 (2) of Act No. XV of 1883, duly [494] certified for the purpose of s. 65 of Act No. I of 1872, or of the corresponding rules as made, confirmed, and published under ss. 22 to 24 of Act No. XV of 1873.'

"The District Magistrate has now forwarded to this Court a publication (apparently unofficial) entitled—'The Municipal Manual of Bareilly, compiled by Preonath Banerji, Municipal Commissioner and Pleader, High Court.'

"The alleged offences of which the appellant has been convicted are:—(1) constructing a sandas (or privy in which night-soil is allowed to accumulate) without the permission of the Municipal Board, and

"I see no reason to doubt that the applicant did the acts alleged to be offences; but I am in doubt whether these acts are offences, and punishable, and for the reasons following:—

"The Bareilly Municipality was, until the 24th January, 1884, a Municipality established under the North-Western Provinces and Oudh Municipalities Act, 1873. On that date the Local Government, acting under s. 5 of Act No. XV of 1883, by Notification No. 13, North-Western Provinces and Oudh Gazette, dated 26th January 1884, Part I, p. 40, applied Act No. XV of 1883 to the Bareilly Municipality, and thereupon the former Act (No. XV of 1873) ceased to apply [Cf. s. 17 (1) (a) of Act No. XV of 1883]; but rules made under the old Act are deemed to have been made under Act No. XV of 1883 and continue in force until repealed by new rules so made. It is, however, provided [s. 71 (2)] that 'the authorities empowered to make such new rules shall, as soon as may be, make them, and take such action as may be necessary for bringing them into force.' No action has been taken under this subsection, and the rules which the applicant has been convicted of infringing are not 'new rules' within the meaning of s. 71 of Act No. XV of 1883. For the two rules now in question to be valid, therefore, they must be rules made under the North-Western Provinces and Oudh Municipal Act, 1873, or any Act repealed thereby (e.g., VI [495] of 1868). The two rules in question are contained in Notification No. 699, dated the 9th October 1879, published at Part III, Municipal Supplement, North-Western Provinces and Oudh Gazette, dated the 18th October 1879; but this notification purports to be a confirmation of rules under s. 22 of Act No. XV of 1873 and a direction that the rules be adopted by all Municipalities. If the notification were a simple confirmation under s. 23 and publication under s. 24, the ordinary presumption would be that the rules had been duly made under s. 22. In that case the direction that they be adopted by all Municipalities would be unnecessary; but from the wording of the notification as it stands, I am in doubt whether it is not intended to express that the Local Government makes the rules under s. 22 and directs that they be adopted (e.g. by all Municipalities which had not previously made these same rules for themselves under s. 22). The Act, however, does not empower the local Government to make rules, but only to confirm rules made by the Municipal Committee; so that if the rules now in question were not made by the Bareilly Municipality before the notification was issued, the notification itself does not make the rules valid and binding. I am unable to discover that the Bareilly Municipal Committee ever did make these rules under s. 22 of Act XV of 1873. It is possible that they may be contained in the bye-laws mentioned at p. 291 of Mr. Fraser's book—Local Rules and orders made under enactments applying to the North-Western Provinces and Oudh—but the publication of those bye-laws is not traced, and publication is essential to validity under s. 24 of Act No. XV of 1873."

The Sessions Judge then referred the case to the High Court.

The Public Prosecutor (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

The Court passed the following:—

A Court ought to presume, until some evidence is given to destroy the presumption, that a Municipality has used [496] the regular and lawful procedure, and that the common course of business has been followed in that procedure. It is for the person raising the objection to give some evidence to show that it would not be safe to make such a presumption. The decision of the High Court at Bombay in The Municipality of Sholapur v. The Sholapur Spinning and Weaving Company (1) is an authority on this subject. A point of this kind should have been taken by the party concerned if there was anything in it, and should not have been taken of its own motion by a Court sitting in appeal or revision. We see no ground for interfering: the rule will be discharged.

ALTAF ALI KHAN AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. LALTA PRASAD
AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs).^{*} [20th May, 1897.]

Mortgage—Lease of mortgaged premises by mortgagee to mortgagor—Remedy of mortgagee for non-payment of rent—Jurisdiction—Civil and Revenue Courts.

Certain mortgagees in whose favour a deed of mortgage providing for possession in lieu of interest had been executed, on the day following the execution of the mortgage granted a lease of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagor. The two documents were registered on the same day. The amount of rent reserved by the lease was exactly equivalent to the amount of interest payable under the mortgage, and the mortgage-deed contained a covenant that any arrears due by the lessee should be a charge upon the mortgaged property. In the counter-part of the lease also a similar covenant making the mortgaged property security for the rent payable under the lease was inserted.

Held, that under the above circumstances, the mortgage and the lease formed merely different parts of the same transaction, and that the mortgagees were entitled to seek their remedy for non-payment of the rent reserved in a Civil Court by means of a suit upon the mortgage and were not obliged to have recourse to a suit for rent in a Court of Revenue. *Baghelin v. JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This appeal has arisen in a suit brought upon a mortgage, dated the 22nd of November 1875. The mortgage-deed provided that the mortgagees were to be placed in possession of the mortgaged property in lieu of interest. Instead of entering into possession themselves, the mortgagees granted a lease of the mortgaged property to the mortgagor on the day following that of the mortgage for the same term as the term of the mortgage. The mortgagor having made default in the payment of the rent stipulated in the lease, which was a sum equivalent to the amount of the interest chargeable on the mortgage-debt, the present suit was brought to recover the amount alleged to be due upon the mortgage. No objection was raised in the Court below or has been raised in this Court as to the competency of the plaintiffs to maintain the present claim. The only question which has been raised, and which we have to determine, is whether, by reason of the granting of the lease to which we have referred, the relation which subsists between the parties was that of landholder and tenant and the plaintiffs' only remedy for the arrears due upon the lease was a suit in a Court of Revenue, or whether the parties stood to each other in the relation of mortgagee and mortgagor and the plaintiffs are entitled to maintain their claim in the Civil Court.

The learned counsel for the appellants relied on an unreported judgment of this Court in Second Appeal No. 1112 of 1894, decided on the 8th of April, 1897. The learned counsel for the respondents on the other hand referred us to the case of Baghelin v. Mathura Prasad (1). In the former case, it was held that under the circumstances of that case the relation between the [498] parties was that of landholder and tenant, the mortgagor having taken a lease from the mortgagee and attorned to him as his tenant. In the latter case, it was held that the transaction was one of mortgage, and, although a lease had been granted, the relation between the parties remained that of mortgagor and mortgagee.

In our opinion, each case must be decided with reference to its own peculiar circumstances. What we have to consider in this case is, what was the intention of the parties when they executed the deeds of the 22nd and 23rd of November, 1875. If it was intended that both the deeds were to form a single transaction, namely, a transaction of mortgage, and the lease was granted simply to provide a mode for realizing the interest payable on the mortgage amount, we must hold that the parties stood in the relation of mortgagee and mortgagor, and that the relation was not altered by reason of the execution of the lease. In this case, we find that the two documents were presented for registration on one and the same date, that the amount of rent reserved by the lease was exactly equivalent to the amount of interest payable on the mortgage, and that the mortgage deed contained a covenant to the effect that any arrears due by the lessee would be a charge on the mortgaged property. In the counter-part of the lease executed by the mortgagor on the 23rd of November, 1875, there is a similar covenant by which the mortgaged property and other properties of one of the mortgagors were made security for the rent payable under the lease, that is, for the amount of interest chargeable under the mortgage. It is a significant circumstance also that in the twelfth paragraph of his written statement, Altaf Ali, the principal defendant, says that the lease was executed only for the sake of facilitating the payment of interest. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, we are of opinion that it was not the intention of the parties that the lease was for any other purpose than the realization of the interest payable upon the mortgage, and that the two deeds of the 22nd and 23rd of November, 1875, must be regarded as [499] one and the same transaction. This case is therefore distinguishable from the unreported ruling relied on by the counsel for the appellants, and it is more in accordance with the case of Baghelin v. Mathura Prasad (1).

The pleas raised in the appeal therefore fail. As was the case in the other appeals between the same parties decided to-day, the amount decreed should be reduced by Rs. 7,099-4-0, which the plaintiffs included in their claim by reason of the judgment of the Subordinate Judge in the suit out of which First Appeal No. 254 of 1894 arose.

The result is that we vary the decree below by making a decree in favour of the plaintiffs under s. 88 of Act No. IV of 1882, for the sale of the mortgaged property in the event of the defendants failing to pay to the plaintiffs or into Court on or before the 3rd of November, 1897, Rs. 64,771-2-0, together with interest at the rate of twelve annas and a half per cent. per mensem on Rs. 30,000, the principal amount of the mortgage, from the 30th of May, 1895, to the 3rd of November, 1897, aforesaid, or to the date of payment, if sooner made, together also with the plaintiff's costs in the Court below, proportionate to the principal and interest now decreed, less Rs. 41-6-0 allowed to the defendants as their costs in that Court, and together also with the plaintiffs' costs of this appeal.

August, 1880. It was purchased by one Ganesh Rai, whose successor in title is the plaintiff. It was alleged by the plaintiff that he obtained formal possession through the Court on the 14th of July, 1884; that he remained in possession for two years, and that subsequently he was dispossessed by the defendant. It was on this allegation that he brought the present suit on the 29th of May, 1895. The Court of first instance found that, although Ganesh Rai had obtained formal possession through the Court, he had never obtained actual possession of the property, and that ever since the auction sale the property has remained in the possession of the defendant. That Court, however, gave the plaintiff a decree, being of opinion that the delivery of formal possession on the 14th of July, 1884, gave to the plaintiff a fresh start for the computation of limitation, and as the suit had been brought within twelve years from that date it was within time. The lower appellate Court has concurred with the Munsif in holding that the plaintiff never obtained actual possession. It, however, seems to have been of opinion that the fact of the delivery of formal possession through the Court was immaterial for the purposes of limitation, and it held that as the defendant had been in possession since the date of the auction sale and the period of his possession had exceeded twelve years, the plaintiff's claim was [501] barred by limitation. That Court accordingly dismissed the suit. It is against the decree of the lower appellate Court that the plaintiff has preferred this appeal, and it is contended on his behalf that limitation should be computed from the date on which formal possession was delivered to Ganesh Rai.

In my opinion this contention must prevail. If possession was delivered to the auction purchaser through the Court in the manner required by s. 318 or 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that delivery of possession gave to the auction purchaser, as against the judgment-debtor whose rights were purchased by him, a conclusive title, and must, as observed by the Calcutta High Court in the case of Juggobundhu Mukerjee v. Ram Chunder Bysack (1), be deemed to be equivalent to actual possession. On the date of delivery of possession, the auction purchaser must be held to have obtained actual possession as against the judgment-debtor, and it is only during the period following that date that the possession of the judgment-debtor, if he continued in possession, could be regarded as adverse. This view is supported by the Full Bench ruling of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Jogobundhu Mitter v. Purnanund Gossami (2), in which it was held that limitation should be computed in a suit for possession against the judgment-debtor from the date of delivery of formal possession. No ruling has been cited on behalf of the respondent to support the contrary view, except the ruling in Krishna Lall Dutt v. Radha Krishna Surkhel (3), which was overruled by the subsequent Full Bench ruling to which I have referred. The decisions of the Bombay High Court in Lakshman v. Moru (4), Harjivan v. Shivram (5), and Namdev v. Ramchandra Gomaji Marwadi (6), relied upon by the learned vakil for the respondent have no bearing upon the present question, as the person in possession in those cases was not the judgment-debtor, but a third party who was unaffected by the proceedings relating to delivery of possession. I am of opinion that the lower Court has erred in [502] holding that limitation should be computed from the date of the auction purchase by Ganesh Rai, the plaintiff's predecessor in title. As I have said above, if possession was delivered to the auction purchaser in the mode prescribed by s. 318 or 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the date of such possession would give to the plaintiff a fresh start for the computation of limitation. In this case s. 319 was the section applicable. The learned Subordinate Judge has not clearly found whether possession was delivered in accordance with the provisions of that section. I therefore refer to him the following issue under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a clear finding :—" Was possession delivered to Ganesh Rai in the manner prescribed by s. 319 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and if so, on what date ?" Procedure—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 211—Witnesses—Right of accused to have witnesses summoned in his defence when he has refused to give in a list in the Magistrate's Court.

If an accused person, on being called upon under s. 211 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to give orally or in writing a list of the persons whom he wishes to be summoned to give evidence on his trial, declines to give in such list, he cannot compel the Magistrate after committal to issue any summonses for witnesses on his behalf. Neither under such circumstances will the Sessions Judge be obliged to issue summonses for the attendance of such witnesses unless he is satisfied that their evidence may be material. Queen-Empress v. Har Gobind Singh (1) referred to.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the order of the Court.
[503] Mr. A. H. C. Hamilton, for the applicant.

ORDER.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—This is an application to transfer a case pending in a Court of Session to another Court of Session on the ground that the Sessions Judge declined to summon certain witnesses for the accused. It appears that these applicants were asked in the Magistrate's Court if they had any witnesses to call. They stated that they reserved their case for the Court of Session and would not file any list of witnesses. Later on, and after commitment, they applied to the Magistrate to summon certain witnesses for the defence. The Magistrate declined on the ground that he was not bound to do so under the Code of Criminal Procedure. Application was then made to the Sessions Judge to have these witnesses summoned. He also declined. It has been contended that this Court, in the case of Queen-Empress v. Har Gobind Singh (1), decided that where an accused person has declined to file a list of witnesses during the inquiry before the Magistrate he is entitled after

* Criminal Miscellaneous No. 34 of 1897.

(1) 14 A. 242.

committal to have the Magistrate summon any witnesses he may name, and, if an application to be made to the Judge before trial, at the trial he is equally entitled to have any witness whom he names summoned. This Court decided nothing of the kind in Queen-Empress v. Har Gobind Singh (1). The Court was dealing there with what had actually taken place. We were referring to certain comments made on the procedure of the Magistrate. It appears to us that if an accused person, on being called upon under s. 211 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to give orally or in writing a list of the persons whom he wishes to be summoned to give evidence on his trial, declines to give in such list, he cannot compel the Magistrate after committal to issue any summonses for witnesses on his behalf. He is of course entitled to call any witnesses in the Court of Session whom he may have in Court, whether or not he has caused such witnesses to be summoned. The Sessions Judge may in his discretion cause any witness to be summoned for the accused on an application made during the trial, and he is bound to procure the attendance [504] of such witnesses, if he considers that their evidence may be material. It may be dangerous in some districts for the accused to run the risk of having his witnesses tampered with. It may thus be wise in some cases for the accused to decline to give a list to the Magistrate, and to reserve his evidence for the Court of Session. In order to entitle him to have his witnesses summoned, he must satisfy the Judge of the probability that such witnesses would be material. We have no doubt in the present case that if these accused do give to the Sessions Judge any reasons for concluding that the witnesses whom they ask to have summoned can give material evidence, the Sessions Judge will take the necessary steps to procure their attendance. We decline to interfere further in this case. The Sessions Judge will act on this application if any case is made out before him, showing that it is a reasonable application and not merely one for delay.

We dismiss this application.

THE facts of this case are as follows :—

The defendants, as representatives of one Musammat Nurbi, the widow of Wazir Khan, on the 4th of December, 1890, brought [505] a suit against Munir Khan, the son and representative of Wazir Khan, to recover a certain amount as Nurbi's dower, and obtained a decree on the 31st January, 1891. Before this decree was passed, Munir Khan, on the 3rd January, 1891, hypothecated two houses and certain other property by a bond to the plaintiff, who, having put that bond in suit, obtained a decree enforcing hypothecation on the 27th of July, 1891, and at an auction sale held in execution of his decree purchased 31 out of 48 sihams in the two houses on the 27th of November, 1891. On the 14th of February, 1892, the plaintiff obtained possession of the share he had purchased. Subsequently the defendants brought to sale, in execution of their decree of the 31st of January, 1891, 28 sihams out of 43 in the said two houses, and themselves became the purchasers on the 27th of June, 1892, and obtained possession on the 9th of September, 1892. The plaintiff had taken an objection to the attachment and sale of this share in the execution department, but his objection was disallowed. Subsequently he brought the present suit to recover possession of 28 out of 48 sihams in the houses in suit by invalidating the order of the 27th of June, 1892, and setting aside the sale of the 27th of June, 1892, on the ground that his decree and purchase had priority over the defendants' decree and purchase.

The suit was decreed in the first Court, and the defendants' appeal was dismissed in the Court of first appeal. The defendants thereupon appealed to the High Court.

As regards the sentence, it is not excessive, but, having regard to the great age of the appellant, I will reduce it to three years' rigorous imprisonment with three months' solitary confinement." Pandeh Bhat has applied in revision to this Court. The only ground in revision which we need consider, and indeed which is open to him in revision, is that the judgment of the Sessions Judge does not comply with the requirements of s. 367 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. By s. 424 of that Code s. 367 is made applicable, so far as may be practicable, to the judgment of any appellate Court other than a High Court.

Our attention has been drawn by the Public Prosecutor to the decisions in Kamruddin Dai v. Sonatun Mandal (1). In the matter of the petition of Ram Das Maghi (2), *Farkan v. It is difficult to lay down any rule with precision as to what judgment of an appellate Court complies and what judgment does not comply with the requirements of the Code of Criminal Procedure. The object, no doubt, of the Legislature in formulating rules as to judgments was partly to insure that a Criminal Court should consider the case before it in its different bearings and should on such consideration arrive at definite conclusions, and also one object may have been that the judgment should show that in fact the Criminal Court had considered the evidence in a case of first instance or in a case of appeal, and had found in case of a conviction that the facts proved to the satisfaction of the Court brought an offence home to the accused person whom the Court convicted.

[508] Now, to take the case of a criminal appeal, in those cases in which an appeal is summarily rejected under s. 421 of the Code, this Court has expressed its opinion as to what the judgment should be in the case of Queen-Empress v. Nannhu (1). We are not dealing here with the case of a judgment of a Court of first instance. We are not dealing with a case in which as a matter of fact the pleader for the appellant in the Court of Session had been heard fully. In our opinion if the Sessions Judge had simply said in his judgment:—"I dismiss this appeal"—that would not have been a judgment: that would have been, so to speak, merely the order which resulted from the conclusions at which the Judge had arrived. A judgment must contain something more than that. It must contain something to justify the order dealing with the appeal. One way to arrive at a conclusion as to what the Legislature contemplated when enacting ss. 367 and 424 of the Code is to take a case, for example, which might occur and which in the experience of some of us has occurred before now. A Magistrate has written a judgment in a criminal case which has resulted in a conviction and a sentence. That judgment shows that the Magistrate had before his mind what were the ingredients in law of the offence of which he convicted the accused. It shows that he had considered the evidence; that he had come to definite conclusions on that evidence; that he had given reasons for those conclusions, and that acting on those conclusions he had found the man before him guilty of a particular offence. The case comes in appeal before a Court of Session. The Sessions Judge after a most careful consideration agrees with every word which the Magistrate has written and can add nothing to what appears in the Magistrate's judgment. What is he to do? Is he to sit down and copy out the Magistrate's judgment, making the necessary alterations to show that it is a judgment in appeal, and not a judgment in first instance, and having done so is he to deliver it as his judgment and sign it? Such a process might appear rather ludicrous, or, to throw the [509] only variety which the Sessions Judge is capable of throwing into the case, agreeing with everything the Magistrate has written and having nothing material to add, is the Sessions Judge to sit down and paraphrase the judgment of the Magistrate in order to produce a semblance of variety? It appears to us that the most reasonable course for the Sessions Judge to take, and one which the Legislature would probably have considered sufficient, and which it has not forbidden, would be for the Sessions Judge in such a case to write such a judgment as the following:—"I have considered the evidence in this case, and I agree with the Magistrate in his conclusions and in the reasons given for them, and in my opinion the sentence which he passed was a proper sentence." It appears to us that such a judgment would be in compliance with the law and not in violation of the law. One must trust to the honour of Sessions Judges, and trust that they would not make such statements in their judgments unless they were true, in the same way as one must trust to the honour of a Sessions Judge and believe that he would not dismiss a criminal appeal unless he were satisfied that the appellant had been properly convicted of the offence and properly sentenced.

Although we say this, we know that Sessions Judges in these Provinces do, and will, in criminal appeals which raise complicated questions of fact or law write full judgments dealing with the questions of fact or law. Such judgments are very useful in case of applications being made to this Court in revision. In the present case there was absolutely no necessity from any point of view for writing one word more than what has been written by the Sessions Judge. The case against the appellant was a perfectly clear one; there could be no two different conclusions arrived at; and if the Sessions Judge had sat down and written a longer judgment dealing with the evidence and the facts, we doubt if he could have improved on the judgment of the Magistrate, in fact he would probably have taken it as his model.

We dismiss this application in revision.

THE MAHARAJA OF BHARTPUR (Plaintiff) v. KACHERU AND OTHERS (Defendants).^{*} [1st June, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 37, 432—Suit brought by an independent prince—Signature and verification of plaint—Recognised agent—Procedure.

Section 432 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not intended to limit the scope of s. 37 of the Code, and does not prevent the institution of a suit by an independent prince in his own name and through a recognised agent other than one appointed under s. 432. *Beer Chuander Manikya v. THIS was a suit brought on behalf of the Maharaja of Bhartpur in the Court of an Assistant Collector of Muttra for the recovery of arrears of rent for 1298 and 1299 Fasli. In the first court the suit was tried on its merits and a decree given for the plaintiff. The defendants appealed to the District Judge, and in his Court the plea was taken that the plaint and verification were not properly signed. The plaint was signed, and attested by one Syed Muhammad, who held a power of attorney from the Maharaja of Bhartpur authorizing him to act on behalf of the Maharaja in suits filed on behalf of or against him; and the contention was that the provisions of s. 37 of the Code of Civil Procedure were, in the case of independent princes, limited by s. 432 of the Code, and that a person

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought on behalf of the Maharaja of Bhartpur in the Court of an Assistant Collector, for the recovery of arrears of rent payable under a lease. The plaint was signed and verified by one Syed Muhammad, who holds a general power of attorney from the Maharaja, authorizing him to act on behalf of the Maharaja in suits filed on behalf of or against him. The suit was defended in the Court of first instance on the merits, and no objection was taken on the ground that the plaint did not comply with the requirements of law in the matter of presentation, signature, and verification. That Court granted a decree to the plaintiff. The defendants appealed, and for the first time it was urged on their behalf that, the plaintiff not having signed the plaint or the verification under it, the suit ought to have been dismissed in the form in which it had been brought. The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court has allowed this plea, and dismissed the suit. He has relied for his conclusions on the provisions of s. 432 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and he was of opinion that that section provided a limitation to the general provisions of s. 37 of the Code. The correctness of this opinion has been questioned in this appeal. The point is not free from difficulty. The plaint is in compliance with the provisions of s. 107 of Act No. XII of 1881, but, as that Act is silent as to the rights of ruling chiefs to institute suits in British Courts, or as to their privileges as regards suits brought against them in such Courts, the general provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure would, according to the ruling of the Full Bench in Madho Prakash Singh v. Murli Manohar (1), govern the suit brought in the Court of Revenue. We have therefore to consider what is the effect of s. 432 of the Code upon the question now before us. It must be admitted that the language of that section is not as clear as it might have [512] been. The section, so far as it bears upon the present question, is as follows:—"Persons specially appointed by order of Government at the request of any Sovereign Prince or ruling Chief, whether in subordinate alliance with the British Government or otherwise, and whether residing within or without British India, or at the request of any person competent in the opinion of the Government to act on behalf of such Prince or Chief, to prosecute or defend any suit on his behalf, shall be deemed to be the recognized agents by whom appearances, acts and applications under this Code may be made or done on behalf of such Prince or Chief." It is contended that, under this section, the only recognized agents by whom applications, acts and appearances may be made or done on behalf of a Sovereign Prince or ruling Chief are the persons referred to in the section, that is, the persons specially appointed by the order of Government at the request of the Sovereign Prince or ruling Chief, or of any person competent to act on behalf of such Sovereign Prince or ruling Chief, to prosecute or defend any suit on his behalf, and that this section limits the scope of s. 37 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This contention would have been a valid contention had the section run thus:—"No persons other than persons specially appointed shall be deemed to be the recognised agents." That would have made the meaning of the Legislature perfectly clear. On the other hand, had the article "the" before the words "recognised agents" been omitted, we should have had no difficulty in accepting the contention of the learned Counsel for the appellant. As we are unable to conceive of any reason why the Legislature should have limited the rights of ruling Chiefs and Sovereign Princes with regard to the appointment of recognised agents which they had under s. 37, it seems to us that the object of s. 432 was to add, in the case of Sovereign Princes and ruling Chiefs, another class of recognised agents to those specified in s. 37. The provisions of s. 464 show that where the Legislature intended that Sovereign Princes or ruling Chiefs should be excepted from the operation of the general provisions of the Code, special provision was made in it [513] for that purpose. Had it been the intention of the Legislature to limit the scope of s. 37 by the provisions contained in s. 432, we should have expected similar provisions in the Code indicating that intention. It was held by the Calcutta High Court in Beer Chunder Manikya v. Ishan Chunder Burdhun (1) that s. 432 does not prevent the institution of a suit by an independent Prince in his own name and through a recognised agent other than one appointed under that section. The section was amended after that ruling was passed. If the law as laid down in the ruling was different from that which the Legislature contemplated by s. 432, the section would in all probability have been amended in such a way as to make the meaning of the Legislature clear. Although, as we have said, the question is one not free from difficulty, we see no reason to put on s. 432 an interpretation different from that placed on it by the Calcutta High Court. In our opinion the learned Judge below was wrong in holding that the plaint had not been properly signed and verified, and in dismissing the claim on that ground. We set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court and remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to that Court with directions to readmit it under its original number in the register and dispose of it according to law. The appellant will get his costs of this appeal.

(1) 5 A. 406.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

17 A.W.N. (1897) 136.

A suit by a retired partner for money alleged to have been agreed to be paid to him by the continuing partners in consideration of his retirement is not excluded from the jurisdiction of a Court of Small Causes.

[514] THIS was a suit to recover Rs. 200 with a certain amount of interest. The plaintiff alleged that he and the defendant were once partners in a pearl-selling venture to which he, the plaintiff, had contributed Rs. 200; that the defendant withdrew from the partnership promising to repay him the two hundred rupees with interest, but that he never did so. The plaint was originally presented to the Court of the Small Cause Court Judge of Agra, who, holding the suit to be a suit relating to a still continuing partnership, returned it to be presented to the proper Court. The plaintiff then took his plaint to the Court of the Munsif, who entertained the suit and ultimately gave the plaintiff a decree. The defendant appealed; and the lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Agra) decreed the appeal and dismissed the suit, on the ground that it was a suit triable only by a Court of Small Causes, and returned the plaint for presentation to such Court. The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant.

Pandit Baldeo Ram Dave, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—The appellant in this second appeal is the plaintiff. He took a plaint to the Court of Small Causes at Agra, and the Judge of that Court refused to entertain it, holding that the matter was not one within his jurisdiction.* The plaintiff then went to the Court of the Munsif, who gave him a decree, holding that the case was one within his jurisdiction as Munsif. The Subordinate Judge in appeal has set aside that decree, being of opinion that the suit was one which fell distinctly within the jurisdiction of a Small Cause Court, and has returned the plaint to be presented to that Court. It is now contended by the plaintiff in appeal that the suit is one which is not cognizable by the Court of Small Causes and that the decision of the Subordinate Judge to that effect was wrong. We have examined the plaint. The suit as laid is a suit by a person who was once a member of a partnership, from which partnership, he says, he retired under an agreement that the surviving partners would thereafter pay him a certain sum for his interest in the business. That sum was never paid, and he now [515] sues to recover it. It was sought by the learned advocate for the appellant to bring the case within clause 29 (c) of the second schedule attached to Act No. IX of 1887. But this is not a suit for the balance of a partnership account, as the partnership, so far as the plaintiff is concerned, does not exist. Clause 29 (c) contemplates a suit to ascertain the profits and loss of a business and to have a balance of a partnership account struck, and was never intended to extend to the recovery of a mere debt due to a retired partner from the firm.

* Second Appeal, No. 152 of 1895, from a decree of Maulvi Aziz-ul Rahman, Subordinate Judge of Agra, dated the 17th November 1894, reversing a decree of Babu Hari Mohan Banerji, Munsif of Agra, dated the 30th June 1894.

The appeal fails and is dismissed, but without costs.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit brought by the respondent against the appellant, his father-in-law, in which he prayed that his wife, the daughter of the defendant, be allowed to live with him, and that her father be restrained from offering obstruction to her doing so. The plaintiff was married to defendant's daughter on the 14th of May 1894. The marriage was celebrated without the consent of the defendant by the girl's mother, whom the defendant had ceased to support for a number [516] of years. It has been found that the girl had attained marriageable age, and that by reason of the father not supporting his wife and daughter, the mother and mother's brother, with whom they had been living, secretly married the girl to the plaintiff. It has been found that the usual rites of marriage were gone through, and that the relationship between the plaintiff and the girl was not such as to render the marriage illegal under Hindu Law. The question which was raised in the lower Courts was whether the marriage under such circumstances was valid according to Hindu Law. The Subordinate Judge, on the authority of the rulings cited by him in his judgment, held that it was a valid marriage and granted to the plaintiff the relief prayed for. Against this decree the defendant has preferred the present appeal, and it has been contended that the marriage of the plaintiff with the defendant's daughter without the defendant's consent was not a valid marriage. We are unable to accept this contention. A uniform course of rulings, dating back to 1843 (see Bacc Rulyat and others v. Jey Chund Kewul, 1 Morley's Digest, 181) has laid down that the want of a guardian's consent would not invalidate a marriage actually and properly celebrated. The authorities on the subject are all collected and carefully reviewed in the learned judgment of Muttusami Ayyar and Shephard, JJ., in Venkatacharyulu v. Rangacharyulu (1), and it seems to us unnecessary to refer to them in detail. In that case, upon the authorities referred to, it was held by the learned Judges that where there is a gift in marriage by the legal guardian and the marriage rites were duly solemnized, the marriage is irrevocable. The mother is a legal guardian of the daughter, though the father is a preferential guardian. If the girl was given away in marriage by her mother and all the necessary rites were duly performed that would make the marriage a valid marriage, and in the absence of force or fraud such marriage would not be regarded as void by reason of the father of the girl not consenting to it. Mr. Madho Prasad on behalf of the appellant concedes that mere absence of the father's consent would [517] not render the marriage void unless there was force or fraud. In this case it is admitted that there was no force, and we are unable to see how it can be urged that the marriage was celebrated by fraud. As we have said above, the learned Subordinate Judge has found that the father of the girl behaved badly towards his wife and daughter and treated them, in a most unnatural manner, that for years he had deserted them, and that in consequence of his conduct they were living with the brother of the mother of the girl who supported and maintained both. The girl had attained a marriageable age, and the defendant, her father, had taken no steps to get her married. It was under such circumstances that the mother and her brother arranged with the plaintiff for the marriage of the girl with the plaintiff, took her to his house and there celebrated the marriage. We cannot hold under these circumstances that any fraud was committed. This appeal fails and is dismissed with costs.

Appeal decreed.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—The suit is concerned with two houses, which for brevity's sake we will call the North and South house. The North house belonged to one Muhammad Raza Khan, the South house to his wife, Hamid-un-nissa. Hamid-un-nissa died in 1875. Her husband, Muhammad Raza Khan, died in 1879, having in 1877 mortgaged both the houses with possession to one Sultan Khan. In 1885 the representatives of Musammat Hamid-un-nissa instituted a suit against the mortgagee Sultan Khan and against the representatives of Muhammad Raza Khan for their shares in the South house, and they got a decree in March, 1886, for 552 out of 624 sihams. On an application for review by the mortgagee a compromise was arrived at between the mortgagee Sultan Khan and the representatives of Hamid-un-nissa, by which the latter were to have possession of both the houses on paying Rs. 65 to the mortgagee. The compromise apparently was made a rule of Court, the money was deposited in January 1886, and possession was given to the representatives of Hamid-un-nissa in 1890. Now the present suit has been instituted by Iman Khan, father of Musammat Hamid-un-nissa. He has impleaded the representatives of Muhammad Raza Khan, and has asked for possession of both houses on the ground that he has been illegally ejected by the representatives of Muhammad Raza. The prayer of his suit is for possession of both houses as mortgagee or in the alternative for recovery of Rs. 93, the mortgage-money. A decree has been passed in favour of the plaintiff for the South house. This appeal has reference to the North house only. The main defence set up by the representatives of Muhammad Raza is that the plaintiff's suit is barred under the second explanation to s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. They alleged that the claim now made might and ought to have been made in the former litigation between the parties. The facts of the former litigation are these:—In June 1890 the representatives of [519] Hamid-un-nissa sued the representatives of Muhammad Raza Khan for possession as absolute owners of the house. No hint of any other title being vested in the plaintiff was then made. The suit was dismissed in appeal in December 1891, the plaintiff having failed to prove the absolute title set up. On these facts it is now contended that this suit is barred under s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In our opinion this contention is correct. Following the case of Amolak Ram v. Champa Lal (1), the case of Mathura Prasad v. Sambhar Singh (2), the case of Hasan Ali v. Siraji Husain (3) and the case of Atchayya v. Bangarayya (4), we are of opinion that the claim in the alternative to hold as mortgagee not merely might, but ought to, have been added to the prayer in the former suit as a matter of attack on the defendant. On this question the judgment of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Kameswar Pershad v. Rajkumari Ruttun Koer (5) is instructive, and, adopting the rule therein laid down, we cannot say that a claim to possession under an absolute title and a claim to possession under a mortgage title are so dissimilar as to cause confusion. On a consideration of these authorities we have no hesitation in holding that the alternative claim to possession as mortgagee ought to have been made a matter of attack in the former suit, and as such was not done, this suit, as far as the North house is concerned, is in our opinion barred by the principle of res judicata laid down in explanation II, s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure. BANERJI, J.—This appeal arises out of proceedings relating to the execution of a decree. The appellant, decree-holder, obtained on the 17th of December, 1886, from the Court of first instance a decree for sale on a mortgage, which was affirmed in appeal on the 10th of August 1887. The decree was one under s. 88 of Act No. IV of 1882. On the 15th of July 1890, the decree-holder applied for an order absolute for sale under s. 89 of that Act, and on the 20th September, 1890, the order asked for was made. He then applied for sale in execution of his decree on the 12th September, 1893. The lower appellate Court has held that this application was beyond time, having been made after the expiry of three years from the date of the application for an order under s. 89 and that execution is therefore barred. In my opinion the Court below was wrong. A decree-holder who obtains a decree under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act is not entitled to apply for the sale of the mortgaged property upon the passing of that decree. His right to obtain execution by sale of [521] the mortgaged property only accrues to him, and the decree made under s. 88 becomes capable of execution, on his obtaining an order absolute for sale under s. 89. Until that order has been passed, the mortgagor's right to redeem does not become extinct, and it is only when the right of redemption of the mortgagor is gone that the mortgagee can cause the mortgaged property to be sold by applying for execution of the decree passed under s. 88. His right to execute that decree thus depends upon the passing of the order absolute for sale under s. 89, and, as I have said, since he could not apply for sale until that order was made, his application for execution would be within time if presented within three years of the date of the order under s. 89. In this case the application for execution was made before the expiry of three years from the date of the order under s. 89. It may be that the application was an application to execute, not the order, but the decree itself; but the right to execute the decree did not accrue to the decree-holder, and the decree did not become capable of execution, until the order was obtained. In this view the application was not time-barred, and the Court below has erred in holding it to be so. It is true that in Oudh Behari Lal v. Nageshar Lal (1) it was held that an application for an order absolute for sale under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act is a proceeding in execution and may be made to the Court executing the decree, but that is not the question before us. The question which arises in this appeal is whether a decree-holder could apply for the execution of a decree obtained by him under s. 88 until he had obtained an order under s. 89. As, in my opinion, he could not do so, his application, if made within three years from the date of the order under s. 89, would be an application within time. I do not mean to imply that it is necessary for the decree-holder to make a separate application for an order under s. 89, though that would be a preferable course to pursue. The prayer for an order under that section and for the sale of the property may be contained in the same application, as [522] held in the case referred to above. I would allow the appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, restore that of the Court of first instance with costs here and in the lower appellate Court.

AIKMAN, J.—The question raised by this appeal was considered by me in Mulchand v. Mukta Pal Singh (2). For the reasons given in my judgment in that case I concur with my brother Banerji in thinking that this appeal should be allowed and in the order proposed by him.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

*Before Mr. Justice Banerji and Mr. Justice Aikman.*WAZIR SINGH (Defendant) v. THAKUR KISHORI RAWANJI THROUGH SHIB GOPAL AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs).*

[7th June, 1897.]

Act No. XII of 1881 (N.W.P. Rent Act), s. 185—Civil Procedure Code, s. 623—Review of judgment—S. 623 of the Code of Civil Procedure not applicable to cases under the Rent Act.

Section 623 and the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which deal with reviews of judgments have no application to suits and proceedings under the N.W.P. Rent Act, 1881.

Where s. 185 of Act No. XII of 1881 applies, it is only in cases where there is no right of appeal that a review can be granted, and that only on the special ground provided for in the Act itself.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Babu Satya Chandar Mukerji, for the appellant.

The respondents were not represented.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for profits by a co-sharer against the lambardar under cl. (b) of s. 93 of Act No. XII of 1881. The claim was to recover Rs. 104-12-6. On the 29th of May, 1893, the Court of first instance made a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 15-12-5. The plaintiff did not appeal from that decree, although an appeal lay under s. 189 [523] of the Act. He, however, applied on the 2nd of July 1893, for a review of the judgment of the Court of first instance under s. 623 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That Court granted the application, modified its decree and made a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 37-2-9. From this decree the defendant appealed to the District Judge, who affirmed the decree passed on the review. The defendant has preferred this second appeal; and he urges in this Court, as he did in the Court below, that s. 623 did not apply, and that the Court of first instance was not competent to review its judgment. In our opinion this plea must prevail. The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure no doubt apply to proceedings under the Rent Act when the Act itself is silent; but we find that in the matter of review of judgment the Act contains special provisions. S. 185 provides that in a suit in which the judgment of the Collector of the District is final, he may order the rehearing of a suit upon the ground of the discovery of new evidence and on no other ground. That section differs from s. 623 of the Code of Civil Procedure in two respects. It authorizes the Court to grant a review of judgment only in a suit in which the judgment is final, and it limits the ground for review to that of the discovery of new evidence. This, in our opinion, is a clear indication of the intention of the Legislature that the provisions of s. 623 should not apply to a suit in a Court of Revenue. It is also clear from the provisions of ss. 201-A and 201-B, that in the case of orders passed upon applications a review of judgment is allowable only when the orders are final and no appeal lies from them. A comparison of these sections with s. 188 confirms us in our opinion that what the Legislature intended was that where there was a right of appeal there should be no right to apply for a review of judgment. It is only in cases where there is no right of appeal that a review can be granted, and that only on the special ground provided for in the Act itself. The provisions of the sections quoted show that in the matter of review the Rent Act is not silent; consequently s. 623 and the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure which deal with reviews [524] of judgments have no application to suits and proceedings under the Rent Act. The Assistant Collector was therefore wrong in reviewing his judgment and in modifying the decree which he made on the 29th of May 1893. The plaintiffs ought to have sought their remedy by appeal. We set aside the decree below and restore the decree of the Assistant Collector, dated the 29th of May 1893. The appellant will get the costs incurred by him here and in the Courts below subsequent to the 29th of May 1893.

* Second Appeal No. 584 of 1895 from a decree of H. G. Pearse, Esq., C.S., District Judge of Agra, dated the 19th February 1895, confirming a decree of Munshi Narain Singh, Assistant Collector of Muttra, dated the 29th September 1893.

SHEO SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs) v. JEONI AND OTHERS

Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, art. 125—Limitation—Alienation—Decree in a collusive suit against a Hindu widow.

Held that the action of a Hindu widow in causing a collusive suit to be brought against her and confessing judgment therein whereby the plaintiff in that suit got a decree for possession of property of which the widow was in possession holding a Hindu widow's estate, amounted to an "alienation" of such property within the meaning of art. 125 of the second schedule of Act No. XV of 1877.

[525] Shah Mul died in 1872,^a and his widow Jeoni took possession of his estate. Jeoni married Ghasi according to the karao form. Mahar Singh instituted a suit in respect of the entire estate of Shah Mul against Jeoni. That suit was compromised on the 12th of March 1883, and on the basis of that compromise a decree was passed in favour of Mahar Singh. On the death of Mahar Singh the present suit was brought by some of the other members of the family of Ram Dayal against Mula, Ghasi and Musammat Jeoni on the ground that the suit which ended in the compromise of the 12th of March 1883 was a collusive suit brought with the intention of injuring the plaintiffs. The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Saharanpur) dismissed the suit as barred by limitation, holding that art. 120 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act applied. The plaintiffs appealed. The lower appellate Court (District Judge of Saharanpur) dismissed the appeal, with reference to the case of Chhaganram Astikram v. Bai Motigarri (1).

The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Moti Lal, for the appellants.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The only question in this appeal is whether art. 125 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act governs the case or art. 120. The lower Courts have applied the latter article and have held the claim to be barred by limitation. The plaintiff's case was this :—Musammat Jeoni, the widow of one Shah Mul succeeded to the property of Shah Mul on his death and acquired therein a Hindu widow's estate. According to the custom of the caste to which she belonged, she married her husband's first cousin, the defendant Ghasi, who is a son of Mahar Singh. The allegation of the plaintiffs is that in order to transfer the property to her second husband, the device to which she resorted was that she got a suit instituted against herself by Mahar Singh, the father of Ghasi, claiming the property of Shah Mul on the ground that, by reason of her second marriage, she had [526] forfeited her right to the estate of Shah Mul, and that she confessed judgment and allowed a decree to be passed in favour of Mahar Singh, which had the effect of transferring the property from her to Mahar Singh. The plaintiffs say that this was an alienation by Jeoni; that it was an alienation which she was incompetent to make, and the plaintiffs bring this suit for a declaration that the alienation is not binding on them and will not affect their rights as reversioners after the death of Jeoni.

The question we have to consider is whether, on the case set up by the plaintiffs, there has been an alienation by the widow within the meaning of art. 125 of the second schedule of the Limitation Act. If an alienation has taken place, that article, and not art. 120, will apply. It is true that the widow has not by deed transferred the property to Mahar Singh, but it is not necessary that an alienation should be made by her by written document. It is sufficient that she has done an act which has necessarily resulted in the transfer of the estate to the transferee. In this case, if the plaintiff's allegations be true, it was the act of the widow herself, namely, her collusion with Mahar Singh, which initiated the suit brought by the latter. The confession of judgment was the next act done by her, the necessary result of which was the decree made by the Court. The Court had no option but to make a decree in accordance with the confession of judgment filed by her. We have no hesitation in holding that these acts of Jeoni, if established, amounted to an alienation of the property, and therefore, if the plaintiffs succeed in establishing the case set up by them, their suit would be governed by art. 125. The only authority cited for the contrary view is a remark made by Mr. Justice Birdwood in the case of Chhaganram Astikram v. Bai Motigavri (1). In that case there was no dispute on the question whether art. 125 or 120 applied, and therefore the observations of the learned Judge were no more than obiter dicta. Whether Jeoni by her re-marriage lost her rights in her husband's estate is not a question which we are called upon to decide at this stage. [527] If the plaintiffs succeed in showing that she did not, that would be a circumstance to be taken into consideration in determining whether the suit brought by Mahar Singh against Jeoni was a collusive suit or not. The result is that we must set aside the decrees below and remand the case under s. 562 of Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of first instance, which we hereby do, with directions to readmit it under its original number in the register and to try it on the merits. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The facts which gave rise to the suit out of which this appeal has arisen were these:—

On the 6th of January 1883 Shib Chandra Singh, Batak and Mahadeo executed a mortgage of a four annas share of zamindari [528] property in favour of Babu Dip Narain Singh, the defendant appellant. On the following day, that is, the 7th of January 1883, they granted to Thakur Hira Singh, respondent, and to Bharat Singh, the father of the other respondent, a mortgage over a similar share. It has been found by the Court below that the same share formed the subject matter of both the mortgages, and this finding has not been challenged in the memorandum of appeal before us. With the amounts borrowed under the two mortgage deeds a prior usufructuary mortgage of the same property was discharged.

The defendant, Babu Dip Narain Singh, brought a suit for sale under his mortgage and obtained a decree on the 11th of May 1889. The other mortgagees obtained a decree upon their mortgage on the 15th of October 1890. Neither mortgagee made the other a party to his suit as required by s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882.

Dip Narain Singh caused a 2 annas 8 pies share to be sold in execution of his decree on the 20th of December 1890, and on the 28th of November 1891 he caused the remaining 1 anna 4 pies share to be sold. He himself purchased both the shares for a consideration of Rs. 2,100 and has obtained possession.

On the 20th July 1893 the plaintiffs caused the same property to be sold in execution of their decree and themselves became the purchasers. As they did not obtain possession, they brought the present suit and prayed for absolute possession on the allegation that they had priority of title. In the alternative they asked for a decree for redemption of the mortgage of the defendant in their character as subsequent mortgagees, and they offered to pay to the defendant Rs. 2,100, the amount of purchase money paid by him for the property, or such other amount as the Court might declare to be payable to him.

The Court below has made a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for redemption upon payment of the sale consideration, and has disallowed the first prayer of the plaint. The defendant has preferred this appeal.

[529] The first contention raised on his behalf is that upon the allegations of the plaintiffs themselves they are not entitled to sue for redemption. This contention has in our opinion no force. The mortgage in favour of the defendant is of a date prior to that of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs therefore are manifestly subsequent mortgagees, and as they were not made parties to the suit in which the defendant obtained his decree, they have not lost the right of redemption which they had as subsequent mortgagees. It is true they stated in the plaint that the mortgages in favour of both the parties were made on the same date and that the rights of the parties as mortgagees were equal. That allegation could not be supported. Even if both the mortgage deeds were executed on the same date, both of them could not have been executed simultaneously and one deed must have been signed after the other. The plaintiffs' mortgage deed purports to be of a later date than that of the defendant's deed, and the plaintiffs have in a subsequent portion of their plaint accepted the status of puisne mortgagees. They are therefore entitled under s. 74 of Act No. IV of 1882 to redeem the defendant's prior mortgage.

The next contention of the appellant, which raises the real question in the case, is that the Court below has erred in allowing redemption upon payment only of the sale price paid by the defendant. We are of opinion that this contention must prevail.

As the plaintiffs were not joined as parties to the defendant's suit for sale, as required by s. 85 of Act No. IV of 1882, they are, notwithstanding the sale in execution of the defendant's decree, in the same position in which they would have been, and have still the same rights which they would have had, if they had been made parties to that suit, that is to say, their right to redeem the prior mortgage of the defendant is saved to them. By s. 75 of Act No. IV of 1882 every second or other subsequent mortgagee has, as regards redemption, "the same rights against the prior mortgagee or mortgagees as his mortgagor has against such prior mortgagee or mortgagees." If the mortgagor chooses [530] to exercise his right of redeeming the prior mortgage, he can only do so, under s. 60, on payment or tender of the prior mortgagee's mortgage money, which, according to s. 58, is "the principal money and interest of which payment is secured for the time being." If a puisne mortgagee elects to redeem the prior mortgage, he, like the mortgagor, will not be entitled to redeem that mortgage save upon payment or tender of the amount due upon that mortgage. Had the puisne mortgagee been joined as a defendant in the suit of the prior mortgagee, he could have prevented the extinction of his right of redemption and redeemed the prior mortgage by paying to the prior mortgagee or into Court within the time fixed by the Court under s. 88 the full amount due to the prior mortgagee. The omission to make the subsequent mortgagee a party to the prior mortgagee's suit has the effect, as we have said, of relegating the subsequent mortgagee to the position in which he was before the institution of that suit. It is therefore still open to him to redeem the first mortgage, but he cannot do so except on the terms on which he could have obtained redemption before the institution of the first mortgagee's suit or under the decree passed in that suit, namely, by payment of the whole amount due under that mortgage. A consideration of the provisions of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, shows that, save when the integrity of a mortgage has been broken up in the manner mentioned in the last paragraph of s. 60, no mortgage can be redeemed except upon payment of the full amount due under it. We are, therefore, of opinion that a subsequent mortgagee is not entitled to redeem the prior mortgage by simply paying the price for which the prior mortgagee may have purchased the mortgaged property at an auction sale held in execution of the decree obtained by him without joining the subsequent mortgagee as a party. That the purchase money is not the criterion for determining the amount which a claimant for redemption must pay is evident from several considerations. Where the amount of the price exceeds the mortgage money, a puisne mortgagee, or other person interested in the property comprised in [531] the mortgage, who seeks to redeem the mortgage cannot be called upon to pay an amount in excess of the mortgage money. Under the first paragraph of s. 60 a mortgagor has the right to redeem on payment or tender of the mortgage money, and ss. 74 and 75 confer on a second or other subsequent mortgagee the right to redeem a prior mortgage on similar terms, so that under those sections the person entitled to redeem is not liable to pay a larger sum than the amount due upon the mortgage sought to be redeemed. Again, where the purchase money is in excess of the amount due upon the mortgage the surplus is paid to the mortgagor.

Surely a subsequent mortgagee or other person having the right of redemption cannot be directed to pay an amount which has been received by the mortgagor and is not payable to the mortgagee. In our opinion the amount upon payment of which redemption can take place must, save where the integrity of the mortgage security has been broken up, be the amount payable to the mortgagee under the mortgage, and where the mortgagee himself has purchased the mortgaged property in execution of a decree for sale obtained by him without joining a subsequent mortgagee as a party, the latter must, if he wishes to exercise the right of redemption left open to him, pay to the prior mortgagee the full amount of the purchase money. It is true that if the purchase money be not equal to the amount of the mortgage, the mortgagee decree-holder would have the right to ask for a decree against the mortgagor under s. 90, but if after the sale a subsequent mortgagee who has not had an opportunity to redeem the prior mortgage redeems it, a decree under s. 90 cannot be passed. Similarly, if a part only of the mortgaged property has been purchased by the mortgagee under the circumstances mentioned above, the whole of his mortgage will be discharged upon redemption by a subsequent mortgagee. But in either case, where the prior mortgagee is himself the purchaser, a subsequent mortgagee must, in our opinion, in order to redeem such prior mortgage, pay him the full amount due upon his mortgage. This view is supported by rulings of the High Courts of Calcutta and Bom-[532] bay, of which it will be sufficient to refer to Ganga Pershad Sahu v. The Land Mortgage Bank (1) and Dadoba Arjunji v. Damodar Raghunath (2). In the case first mentioned the learned Judges of the Calcutta High Court observed:—"It is hardly necessary to remark that the amount payable would not be the amount of the purchase money paid by the plaintiff, but the amount due under his mortgage." The case went up in appeal to the Privy Council, and their Lordships allowed to the mortgagee purchaser compound interest in accordance with the terms of his mortgage deed. In the case in the Bombay High Court the prior mortgagee purchased the mortgaged property for Rs. 13 and the lower appellate Court decreed redemption upon payment of that amount. On appeal to the High Court, Sargent, C. J., after holding that the defendants, who had not been made parties to the mortgagee's suit, "were entitled to have an opportunity to redeem the property from the plaintiff," said:—"We have only to consider whether the terms on which the Court below has allowed them to do so, against which the plaintiff appeals, are correct. Had the defendants been made parties to the mortgage suit they would have been entitled to redeem on payment of what was then due on the mortgage, and such are the terms on which they must now be allowed to redeem." A decree was made for redemption upon payment of Rs. 398.

We were much pressed with the ruling of this Court in Baldeo Bharthi v. Hushiar Singh (3) as supporting the contention of the plaintiffs respondents that they are entitled to redeem the defendant upon payment only of the purchase money paid by him. The Court below also has relied on this ruling. We are, however, of opinion that that case is distinguishable from the case before us. That was a suit for sale brought upon a subsequent mortgage against the representatives of the mortgagors and of one Gurdayal Jati, who had purchased the mortgaged property in execution of a simple decree for money held by himself. A lien, however, was

(1) 21 C. 366.

(2) 15 B. 486.

(3) 15 A.W.N. (1895) 45.

[533] created in favour of Gurdayal Jati under a compromise for the amount of his decree. The mortgage in favour of the plaintiff to that suit was of a date subsequent to that of the creation of the lien. It was held that the representatives of Gurdayal Jati were entitled to use the lien as a shield for their protection against the claim of the plaintiff to the extent only of the price paid by him for the property and not to the full extent of the amount for which the lien was granted. The reasons for that conclusion were thus stated:—"It is obvious that if the three villages in question had been sold to three different parties, each one of such parties could not have claimed a lien to the full extent of the money due under the decree as a shield in his case. Again, it is obvious that, if at the time of the sale the amount due under the decree of the 24th of September 1858, far exceeded the purchase money paid at the sale, the purchaser could only have got the protection of the lien to the extent of the money paid by him pro tanto in discharge of the mortgage, and that he would not be entitled to stand in the shoes of the mortgagee as to the balance remaining due. The full right of the mortgagee to recover the balance due to him would not, on the realization of part of the money due to him by sale of the mortgaged property, pass, as to the balance remaining due, to the purchaser at the sale, and the rights cannot be in two persons at the same time." Those reasons do not apply to this case. This suit is not, like the suit in that case, a suit by a subsequent mortgagee for sale, and the defendant has not been made a party qua purchaser, like the representatives of Gurdayal Jati. As a purchaser whose purchase money went to the partial discharge of a prior charge, Gurdayal Jati could not use that charge as a shield except to the extent to which the prior charge was satisfied by his purchase. In this case subsequent mortgagees are suing to redeem the prior mortgage, and as the property of which the plaintiffs are the subsequent mortgagees was liable for the whole amount of the prior mortgage, they cannot relieve that property from liability under the prior mortgage without paying the whole of that amount. The fact that the mortgagee himself has purchased [534] the property cannot in our opinion make any difference in this respect. Had a third party purchased the property, and had his purchase money discharged the prior mortgage in full, he would undoubtedly have been entitled to claim that a subsequent mortgagee who, by reason of his not being a party to the prior mortgagee's suit, had the right to redeem him, must pay him the full amount of the prior mortgage. But if the purchase money paid by such a purchaser did not fully satisfy the amount of the prior mortgage, he is not entitled, upon redemption by a puisne mortgagee, to the whole amount of the prior mortgage. The subsequent mortgagee would in our opinion have to pay the full amount due upon the prior mortgage but that amount would be apportioned between the purchaser, whose purchase money satisfied the mortgage in part, and the mortgagee to whom the balance of the mortgage money is due. Where there are more purchasers than one, the apportionment should be made between them pro rata and the balance should go to the mortgagee. But in no case can redemption be allowed except upon payment of the whole amount due under the mortgage.

In the case before us the first mortgagee himself is the purchaser. We consider that he is entitled to the whole amount due under his mortgage on the date of his auction purchase, and not simply to the purchase money paid by him. The bulk of the property was purchased by him on the 20th of December 1890. The Court below has found, on the issue referred to it under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that on that date the amount of principal and interest due was Rs. 7,164-5-0, and that nothing was realized from the debtor after that date. The correctness of the amount so found to be due has not been questioned. It has been urged that the profits realized from the property by the defendant after his purchase should be set off against the mortgage money. We are, however, of opinion that, having regard to the amount of the profits arising from the property, it would be fair not to take the profits into consideration, and at the same time not to allow interest on the mortgage money for the [535] period subsequent to the date of the defendant's auction purchase. In our judgment the plaintiffs should have been granted a decree for redemption on their paying to the defendant Rs. 7,164-5-0. We vary the decree below by substituting Rs. 7,164-5-0 for Rs. 2,100, as the amount upon payment of which, with the proportionate costs of the defendant-appellant here and in the Court below, the plaintiffs will obtain redemption of the property in suit. We extend the time for the payment of the said amount to the 15th of December 1897, and we award to the plaintiffs costs proportionate to their success here and in the Court below.

PRAG NARAIN (Defendant) v. MUL CHAND AND OTHERS
(Plaintiffs).^{*} [18th June, 1897.]

Act No. IX of 1872 (Indian Contract Act), s. 107—Sale—Non-payment of purchase money—Resale—Right of resale to be exercised within a reasonable time of breach—Measure of damages.

In the case of a sale, if the purchaser does not perform his part of the contract, he is liable in damages to the seller, the measure of damages being the difference between the contract price and the price which the seller could have obtained for the article at the time of the breach of contract.

If a vendor, on breach of contract by non-payment of the purchase-money, elects to exercise the right of re-sale given to him by s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act, 1872, not only is the vendor bound to wait a reasonable time after giving notice to the vendee of his intention to re-sell before actually re-selling, but he is also bound to exercise his right of re-sale within a reasonable time after the date of the breach.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for damages for breach of a contract entered into with the plaintiffs respondents on the 11th of September 1891, by Munshi Nawal Kishore, the original defendant to the suit, who has died since its institution and is now represented by the appellant, whereby Munshi Nawal [536] Kishore purchased from the plaintiffs 500 shares owned by them in the Cawnpore Cotton Mills Company for a consideration of Rs. 40,000. A contract in writing was signed by Munshi Nawal Kishore. It was agreed that the price should be paid and the share-certificates delivered on the 25th of September 1891. On that date the plaintiffs sent a telegram to Munshi Nawal Kishore reminding him of the fact that the price was due and asking him to send it promptly. No payment was made. Both the parties agree that a few days afterwards a conversation took place between Munshi Nawal Kishore and Jaggi Lal, one of the plaintiffs, at the office of the Victoria Cotton Mills Company at Cawnpore. As to the nature of the conversation the parties are at variance. While Munshi Nawal Kishore alleged that Jaggi Lal released him from liability under the contract, Jaggi Lal denies that he did so. On the 10th of October 1891, Munshi Nawal Kishore caused a letter to be despatched from Lucknow to the address of the plaintiffs at Cawnpore in which he stated that the contract had by mutual consent been cancelled, and asked Jaggi Lal to intimate that fact to Munshi Nawal Kishore by letter. Whether that letter reached the plaintiffs or not is a matter in issue between the parties. Nothing took place afterwards until the 6th of August 1892, when Messrs. Sanderson and Company, Solicitors, on behalf of the plaintiffs wrote a letter to Munshi Nawal Kishore demanding from him Rs. 40,000, the price of the shares purchased by him, with interest thereon at Rs. 7 per cent. and informing him that if payment was not made and delivery of the shares was not taken within one week of the date of the letter the shares would be sold at his risk and he would be sued for the difference. To this letter Munshi Nawal Kishore replied through his pleader denying that he had entered into any contract for the purchase of shares in the Cawnpore Cotton Mills Company. On the 17th of September 1892, the plaintiffs caused the 500 shares to be sold at auction by one Mr. Noronha, and they realized Rs. 28,810. The plaintiffs brought the present suit claiming the difference of Rs. 11,190, together with interest, the amount of commission alleged to have been paid to [537] Mr. Noronha, and the fees paid to Messrs. Sanderson and Company for the letter of demand. The total amount claimed was Rs. 14,812-11-6. The lower Court has made a decree in favour of the plaintiffs for Rs. 11,190 and dismissed the remainder of the claim. Against this decree the defendant has preferred this appeal, and the plaintiffs have taken objections under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The pleas raised on behalf of the appellant are twofold, first that the Court below has erroneously held that the allegation of the defendant as to his having been released from liability by the plaintiffs was not proved, and secondly, that in any case the plaintiffs ought to have resold the shares within a reasonable time from the date of the breach of contract by Munshi Nawal Kishore, and that they could only claim as damages the difference between the contract price and the market price of the shares on the date of the breach of contract.

As regards the first plea we agree with the conclusion arrived at by the Court below. The statement of Munshi Nawal Kishore was that after he had entered into the contract on the 11th of September, 1891, he came to Allahabad and there learnt that the affairs of the Company were in an unsatisfactory condition and that he would sustain a loss by his purchase; that in October following he met Jaggi Lal and Mul Chand, plaintiffs, at the office of the Victoria Cotton Mills Company in the presence of Mr. West, the Manager of that Company; that he spoke to Jaggi Lal about what he had learnt at Allahabad; that thereupon Jaggi Lal said to him that if he, Munshi Nawal Kishore, apprehended any loss he need not take the shares; that he might write and say that the transaction was cancelled and that he, Jaggi Lal, would send an answer to the same effect. Munshi Nawal Kishore further stated that in accordance with this conversation he wrote the letter of the 10th of October, 1891, referred to above and sent it under a cover addressed to Mr. West; that subsequently in November he met Jaggi Lal and Mul Chand at Cawnpore, and on that occasion also Jaggi Lal reaffirmed what he had said before as to the cancellation of the [538] contract. Jaggi Lal on the other hand has sworn that when Munshi Nawal Kishore asked him to cancel the contract of sale, he, Jaggi Lal, refused to do so and said he would bring a suit, and that Munshi Nawal Kishore would have to pay the money with interest at 7 per cent. He denies having received the letter of the 10th of October. We are unable to accept in its entirety either version of the conversation which took place at the office of the Victoria Cotton Mills Company between Munshi Nawal Kishore and Jaggi Lal. It seems to us to be in the highest degree improbable that Jaggi Lal, who on the preceding 25th of September had telegraphed to Munshi Nawal Kishore for payment and was evidently anxious to enforce the contract, at once consented to release Munshi Nawal Kishore from liability for the breach of contract, which had already taken place, as soon as Munshi Nawal Kishore asked him to do so. It is true that it has been proved that the letter of the 10th October printed at page 30 of the appellant's book was despatched from Lucknow on that date, and it is probable that it reached Jaggi Lal. But the circumstances of Jaggi Lal's not replying to it and of his retaining in his hands the written contract signed by Munshi Nawal Kishore leave no room for doubt that Jaggi Lal never acceded to Munshi Nawal Kishore's request to discharge him from liability. The truth seems to lie between the statements made by Munshi Nawal Kishore on the one hand and Jaggi Lal on the other. It is most likely that Jaggi Lal, instead of refusing positively to accept Munshi Nawal Kishore's proposal, gave him an evasive answer, and that Munshi Nawal Kishore, not having received Jaggi Lal's assent to his proposal, wrote the letter of the 10th of October 1891, simply with a view to make evidence. The answer sent on behalf of Munshi Nawal Kishore in reply to the letter received by him from Messrs. Sanderson and Company was, to say the least of it, disingenuous. He certainly knew that he had signed a contract, the other party to which was the plaintiff Mul Chand, and it was certainly not the fact, upon his own admissions, "that he never had any negotiations or agreement with Lala Mul Chand regarding the [539] sale of shares in the Cawnpore Cotton Mills Company, Limited," as stated in the letter of his pleader, dated the 18th of August, 1892, printed at page 19 of appellant's book. We are therefore unable to accept Munshi Nawal Kishore's statement that Jaggi Lal released him from liability.

As regards the second plea we agree with the contention of the learned counsel for the appellant that in the case of a sale, if the purchaser does not perform his part of the contract, he is liable in damages to the seller, the measure of the damages being the difference between the contract price and the price which the seller could have obtained for the article at the time of the breach of promise. This is evident from illustrations (a) and (d) to s. 73 of the Indian Contract Act. In this case the plaintiffs have, under s. 107 of that Act, claimed compensation for the loss sustained by them on the re-sale of the shares purchased by the defendant on which the plaintiffs had a lien for the unpaid price. It has been contended on behalf of the appellant that if the plaintiffs elected to exercise the right of re-sale which they had under s. 107, they were bound not only to re-sell the property after a reasonable time from the date of their giving notice to the buyer of their intention to re-sell it, but they were bound to exercise their right of re-sale within a reasonable time after the date of the breach. Section 107 in explicit terms requires that if the seller who has a lien for the unpaid price wishes to re-sell the goods sold, he must allow a reasonable time to elapse between the date of his giving notice to the buyer of his intention to re-sell and the date of the re-sale. But the section does not in terms provide that the right to re-sell should be exercised within a reasonable time from the date of the breach of contract. On this point the section is silent. We have therefore to look to general principles as a guide for determining the question whether a buyer who wishes to re-sell the goods sold must do so within a reasonable time from the date on which the contract was broken or whether he may do so at any time after the date of the breach. A buyer, it is true, may claim the price at any time after the stipulated date for payment has [540] expired, if not precluded from doing so by the law of limitation, but if he chooses to enforce his right to re-sell, he must, it seems to us, do so within a reasonable time from the date of the breach, and should not allow the value of the goods to depreciate by making undue delay in re-selling them. In Mayne on damages, 5th edition, p. 176, it is stated on the authority of Pott v. Flather (1) that "as there is no obligation on the part of the vendor to sell at all, so if he refrains from selling at the time of the breach he takes upon himself all risk arising from further depreciation." In Addison's Law of Contract, 9th edition, p. 526, the rule on the subject is thus stated:—"If the goods have been re-sold by the vendor within a reasonable time after the breach of contract by the purchaser, the measure of the damages will be the difference between the price agreed to be given and the price realized on the re-sale, with the costs and expenses of the re-sale, but if the re-sale has been unreasonably delayed until the market has fallen, the price realized on such re-sale will not afford a true criterion of the damage." These are authorities for holding that if the seller elects to re-sell, he must do so within a reasonable time from the date on which the contract was finally repudiated by the buyer. Any other conclusion might cause undue hardship to the buyer. A seller may, with the deliberate intention of causing loss to the buyer, delay the re-sale until the market has fallen and then re-sell the property, and thereby cause to the buyer a loss which he might not have sustained had the re-sale taken place within a reasonable time from the date of the breach of contract. In the case of a re-sale, the buyer is entirely deprived of his property, and that distinguishes the case of a claim for damages upon a re-sale from that of a claim for the unpaid price. In the latter case the buyer would get the property and be in a position subsequently to compensate himself by waiting for a rise in the market. In our opinion the plaintiffs ought to have re-sold the shares sold by them within a reasonable time from the date on which the contract was finally repudiated by Munshi Nawal Kishore. We may take the 10th of October, 1891, [541] as the date on which such repudiation finally took place. The plaintiffs would have been justified in waiting for a reasonable time before electing to re-sell, and they were bound under s. 107 of the Indian Contract Act to allow a reasonable time to elapse between the date of their giving notice to the buyer of their intention to re-sell, and that of the actual re-sale. We hold that under the circumstances of this case the reasonable time after which the shares in question should have been re-sold expired on the 31st of December 1891, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover as damages the difference between the contract price and the price of the shares which prevailed on the 1st January, 1892. There is no evidence on the record which can enable us to ascertain the value of the shares on the date last mentioned. The Subordinate Judge in our opinion improperly excluded an important piece of evidence, namely, the register of the transfer of shares of the Cawnpore Cotton Mills Company, Limited. We accordingly refer to the Court below the following issue under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure:—

What was the value of the shares in question on the 1st of January 1892?

The Court below will receive such further evidence as may be tendered by the parties. On receipt of the finding ten days will be allowed for objections.

Mortgage—Sale by mortgagor of part of the mortgaged property—Suit by mortgagee for sale without joining vendees—Subsequent suit to eject mortgagor's vendees—Cause of action.

A mortgagor, who had given a simple mortgage over certain land, sold some of the mortgaged property. The mortgagee, after such sale had taken [542] place and without making the vendees parties to his suit, brought a suit for sale on his mortgage, and having caused the mortgaged property to be sold, including that portion which had been sold by the mortgagor, purchased it himself. The mortgagee then sued to eject the vendees of the mortgagor. Held that the suit would not lie inasmuch as the plaintiff mortgagee had at its commencement no title to present possession of that particular portion of the mortgaged property as against anyone.

The judgment of the Court (EDGE, C.J., BLAIR, BANERJI, BURKITT and AIKMAN, JJ.) was delivered by EDGE, C.J.:—

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—The plaintiff obtained a simple mortgage from one Abdul Kadir in 1879. On the 18th of September, 1886, the mortgagor sold 27 bighas of the mortgaged property to Gobind Rai and Tulshi Rai, the defendants in the suit. Mr. Abdul Raoof for the plaintiff, appellant, informs us that the plaintiff brought a suit for sale, on his mortgage of 1879 against Abdul Kadir after the 18th of September, 1886. To that suit Gobind Rai and Tulshi Rai were not parties. On the 28th of March, 1891, the plaintiff obtained a decree for sale in his suit against Abdul Kadir; he brought the property to sale, got permission to buy, and purchased the property at the sale held in execution of his decree. He has now brought this suit, claiming to eject Gobind Rai and Tulshi Rai from a portion of the 27 bighas above-mentioned, the equity of redemption in which had been sold to them in 1886 by Abdul Kadir by a registered deed. The Court of first instance gave the plaintiff a decree for possession with a conditional right to these defendants to redeem. The lower appellate Court in appeal dismissed the plaintiff's suit.

The plaintiff can only succeed in this suit for possession on proof of title to a present possession at the date of his suit. His simple mortgage did not entitle him to possession as against any one. His decree for sale, being in a suit to which these defendants were not parties, had no effect as against them, and his purchase [543] at the sale held under the decree conferred on him no title as against these defendants. The result is that the plaintiff had no title to possession at the commencement of the suit against these defendants, and his suit was properly dismissed, though on other grounds. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The respondents brought a suit for sale upon a mortgage of 1873 and obtained a decree for sale in 1891 against their mortgagor and against Hira Lal, the present [544] appellant, who was impleaded as a subsequent mortgagee. At the time when that suit was brought there was subsisting on a portion of the mortgaged property a prior mortgage in favour of one Durga Prasad. Durga Prasad was not made a party to the respondent's suit. Durga Prasad got a decree, upon his mortgage in 1881, but he also did not join the respondents as parties to his suit. After the respondents had obtained their decree, Durga Prasad put his decree of 1881 into execution and caused a portion of the property mortgaged to the respondents, amounting to one-sixth of 10 bighas, to be sold and Hira Lal purchased it. The respondents having applied for an order absolute for sale under s. 89 of Act No. IV of 1882, Hira Lal objected to the one-sixth share out of 10 bighas being ordered to be sold in satisfaction of the respondent's mortgage decree on the ground that he had acquired priority over the respondents in respect of that portion of the property by virtue of his auction purchase under the decree of Durga Prasad obtained on a mortgage of a date prior to that of the respondents. The Court of first instance allowed his objection, but on appeal the lower appellate Court overruled it and ordered the sale of the share which formed the subject-matter of the objection. Hira Lal has preferred this second appeal, and the first plea urged on his behalf is that no appeal lay to the lower appellate Court.

The plea was founded on the argument that Hira Lal in objecting to the sale of the share referred to above was doing so, not in his character as judgment-debtor to the decree obtained by the respondents, but as a third party who was the auction purchaser in execution of a decree under a prior mortgage. We are unable to sustain this objection. This case comes within the principle of the Full Bench ruling in Seth Chand Mal v. Durga Dei (2).

We think, however, that the second plea taken in appeal must prevail. Hira Lal having purchased the property in question in execution of Durga Prasad's decree under his prior mortgage, stands in the shoes of Durga Prasad. It is true that the respondents were not parties to Durga Prasad's suit, and are therefore [545] entitled to redeem Hira Lal, but that circumstance will not entitle them to treat the decree as non-existent and to bring the property to sale free from the prior incumbrance in favour of Durga Prasad. As they also did not make Durga Prasad a party to their suit, and did not redeem Durga Prasad's prior mortgage, that mortgage must be taken to be a subsisting mortgage as against them. According to the ruling of the Full Bench in Matta Din Kasodhan

(1) 13 A. 432.

(2) 12 A. 313.

v. Kasim Husain (1) a subsequent mortgagee is not entitled to bring the mortgaged property to sale subject to a prior mortgage. Therefore the respondents cannot sell the property in question subject to the prior mortgage of Durga Prasad. On this part of the case the lower appellate Court did not arrive at a right conclusion. The case stands thus:— The respondents are not entitled to sell the property in question free from the prior mortgage of Durga Prasad, and they are not entitled to sell it subject to that mortgage. Therefore they are not entitled to sell it at all under the decree obtained by them. On this point we must set aside the judgment of the lower appellate Court. As that Court did not decide the other questions raised, we remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to that Court with directions to readmit it under its original number in the register and to dispose of it according to law. The appellant will have his costs of this appeal.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

[5th July, 1897.]

Act No. IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), s. 82—Mortgage—Contribution—Principles upon which contribution is to be assessed.

On the 4th of July, 1874, thirty-eight villages were mortgaged by Kadir Ali and Umrao Begam to Raja Shiu Raj Singh, the father of the appellant. On the 28th of February 1878, the mortgagee obtained a decree for sale on his mortgage. At the date of this mortgage, some of the villages comprised therein were [546] liable under one or both of two decrees obtained on prior mortgages. Subsequently to the decree of the 28th of February 1878, four of the villages affected by that decree were sold in execution of a simple money decree and were acquired from the purchasers by one Ahmad-ud-din Khan. On the 20th of August, 1879, and the 20th of August, 1882, these same four villages were brought to sale in execution of the decree of the 28th of February, 1878, and were sold for Rs. 44,500. Thereupon the former purchaser, Ahmad-ud-din Khan, brought a suit against the representative of the mortgagee of 1874 and certain other persons for contribution, alleging that the said four villages had been sold for considerably more than the amount for which they were proportionately liable under the mortgage decree; that the defendants were owners of villages which were equally liable with his (the plaintiff's) villages under the decree of the 28th of February 1878, but which had contributed nothing towards the satisfaction of that decree; that six of those villages and an eighth share in a seventh had been purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh (the predecessor in title of the defendant Raja Hari Raj Singh) in execution of simple money decrees, and that a share in an eighth village had been similarly purchased by the predecessor in title of the other defendants. Against these villages the plaintiff sought contribution.

Held that in calculating the amount to which the plaintiff was entitled by way of contribution, the plaintiff was bound to take into account the liabilities which existed on most of the villages in respect of which the suit was brought under the two prior mortgages; that the plaintiff was entitled to obtain contribution from those villages only which had not been sold in execution of the decree of the 28th of February 1878; that the unrealized balance of that decree must be regarded as the amount which the villages purchased by the decree-holder himself had contributed to the decree, and further that in determining the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover regard must be had to the claims for contribution of the owners of such of the other mortgaged villages as had been sold in execution of the decree of the 28th of February 1878, and had, like the plaintiff's villages, fetched more than their quota of liability for the decree.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court. Mr. T. Conlan, Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri and Babu Ratan Chand, for the appellant.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for contribution and arose out of the following circumstances. On the 4th of July, 1874, thirty-eight villages were mortgaged by Kadir Ali and Umrao Begam to Raja Shiu Raj Singh, the father of the [547] appellant. On the 28th of February, 1878, he obtained a decree for sale under the said mortgage in suit No. 77 of 1877. This decree we will refer to in this judgment as decree No. 77 to distinguish it from two other decrees, Nos. 65 and 66, to which reference will also be necessary. In consequence of certain proceedings which it is unnecessary to detail, nine villages and a fourth share of a tenth village ceased to be liable under decree No. 77, which therefore had effect only as against twenty-eight and three-fourths villages. Four of the villages affected by this decree were sold in execution of a simple money decree, and were acquired by the plaintiff from the purchasers. Those villages were brought to sale on the 20th of August, 1879, and 20th of August, 1882, in execution of decree No. 77, and they fetched at auction Rs. 44,500. The plaintiff states that the proportionate amount due from his villages on account of the decree No. 77 was Rs. 22,370-1-0. He sues to recover the difference from the defendants on the ground that the defendants are owners of villages which were equally liable with the plaintiff's villages under decree No. 77, but which have contributed nothing towards the satisfaction of that decree. Six of those villages and an eighth share in a seventh were purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh, in execution of simple money decrees, and a share in an eighth village was similarly purchased by Janki Das, the predecessor in title of defendants Nos. 2 to 5. It is from these villages that the plaintiff seeks to obtain contribution. He has got a decree for the principal amount of his claim, but without interest. Against this decree the defendants have preferred this appeal and First Appeal No. 299 of 1893, and the plaintiff has filed a cross-appeal (No. 287 of 1893) in respect of the refusal of interest. It is contended on behalf of the defendant-appellant that the principle upon which the plaintiff has apportioned among the several villages liable to contribute to the decree No. 77, the amounts of their proportionate liability is erroneous; that he has not taken into account the liabilities which existed on most of those villages under the prior mortgages upon which decree Nos. 65 and 66 were passed; that the plaintiff is [548] entitled to claim contribution from those villages only which have not been sold in execution of decree No. 77; that the unrealized balance of that decree must be regarded as the amount which the villages purchased by the decree-holder himself have contributed to the decree, and that in determining the amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover regard must be had to the claims for contribution of the owners of such of the other mortgaged villages as have been sold in execution of decree No. 77 and have, like the plaintiff's villages, fetched more than their quota of liability for the decree.

In our opinion these contentions are valid and must prevail.

By s. 82 of Act No. IV of 1882 "where several properties, whether of one or several owners, are mortgaged to secure one debt, such properties are, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, liable to contribute rateably to the debt secured by the mortgage, after deducting from the value of each property the amount of any other incumbrance to which it is subject at the date of mortgage." This rule is based on the principle "that a fund which is equally liable with another to pay a debt shall not escape because the creditor has been paid out of that other fund alone."—(Fisher on Mortgages, 4th Edition, p. 659). It therefore follows that such of the mortgaged properties as have been sold for realization of the mortgage-money and have thus contributed to the mortgage-debt are not liable to a claim for contribution, and that such a claim can only be advanced by the owners of those villages which have contributed more than their rateable share of the debt and against those portions of the mortgaged property only which have not contributed to the mortgage-debt and have benefited by the sale of the property of the claimants for contribution. The unsold portion of the mortgaged property affords the fund out of which the claims of all the persons whose villages have contributed more than their own share of liability must be satisfied. This is a consideration which the plaintiff has entirely kept out of view in putting forward his claim.

[549] The next observation which we deem it necessary to make is that the villages which were liable to contribute to the decree No. 77 were not all the villages comprised in the mortgage on which that decree was passed, but those of the mortgaged villages only against which the decree could be enforced. Such of the mortgaged villages as had been sold in execution of decrees obtained upon prior mortgages could not be proceeded against for realization of the amount of decree No. 77. It is admitted by both the parties that the entire villages Aurangzebpur and Lakhiwala, 17½ biswas of Begampur Haru and 1¼ biswas of Mansa were sold in satisfaction of prior mortgages. Those villages were not therefore liable under the decree No. 77, and should, in addition to the nine and a quarter villages to which we have referred at the commencement of this judgment, have been excluded from the list of villages affected by that decree.

Under s. 82 of Act No. IV of 1882, the liability of the villages from which the holder of the decree No. 77 was entitled to realize the amount of that decree is proportionate to the value of each village, after deducting from such value the amount of the incumbrance or incumbrances to which each village was liable on the date of the mortgage on which decree No. 77 was passed, that is, on the 4th of July 1874. The plaintiff in preparing the account filed with his plaint has wholly ignored the provisions of s. 82, and the admitted fact that several of the villages liable under the decree No. 77 were also liable under decrees Nos. 65 and 66, or one of them, on the date of the mortgage which formed the basis of the decree No. 77. The proportionate amount for which those villages were liable under decrees Nos. 65 and 66 should have been deducted from the value of those villages as required by the aforesaid section.

The plaintiff has calculated the rateable share of the liability of the several villages with reference to the amount of Government revenue assessed on and payable by each village and not according to its actual market value. This course has been adopted by the Court below also. Exception was at first taken on behalf of the [550] appellant to this mode of calculation, but the objection was subsequently waived and the learned counsel on both sides agreed that the amount of revenue payable for each village should be taken as the measure of the profits yielded by each. The learned counsel for the appellant has asked us to hold 18 times the annual revenue to be the value of each village for the purposes of this suit. Having regard to the prevailing selling price of property of this description, which varies from 16 to 20 years' purchase, we think that 18 years' revenue may reasonably be assumed to be the fair value of the villages in question, and that for the purpose of apportioning to each village the amount of its rateable share of the mortgage debt we may take 18 times the Government revenue to be the value of each. From this value should be deducted the proportionate amount of the incumbrances to which each village was subject under the decrees Nos. 65 and 66 at the date of the mortgage.

The learned counsel on both sides have agreed that out of the 31 villages against which decree No. 65 was passed, one, namely, Haji Muhammadpur was sold by auction in satisfaction of a prior mortgage, and was not therefore liable under that decree. It is also agreed that the same village, which was one of the 28 villages against which decree No. 66 was passed, was for the same reason not liable under the decree No. 66. It is further agreed that of the villages which were liable to contribute to the decree No. 77, the following, namely, Chela, Cheli, Jafarpur Kot, Ghalib Alipur, Chandki and Chak Khojawala were not included in decrees Nos. 65 and 66, and were not therefore subject to any incumbrance under those decrees, and that the villages Muhammadpur Tilok, Bhagwanpur Partab and Yar Muhammadpur Pirthi, were not liable under decree No. 66. It is further admitted that the villages Tanda Maidaswala, Sipah and Basanta were, before the date of the mortgage of the 4th of July, 1874, upon which decree No. 77 was passed, sold by auction in execution of decree No. 65 and purchased by Umrao Begam and that Umrao Begam mortgaged them to Raja Shiu Raj Singh under the mortgage-deed of [551] the 4th of July, 1874. Those villages were not therefore subject to any prior incumbrance on that date. This being so, no deduction should be made on account of any prior incumbrance from the value of nine out of the twelve villages mentioned above, and from the value of three, namely, Muhammadpur Tilok, Bhagwanpur Partab and Yar Muhammadpur Pirthi, a rateable deduction should be made on account of decree No. 65 only.

The next question to be considered is—what, on the 4th of July, 1874, were the amounts of incumbrances under decrees Nos. 65 and 66 on the villages liable to contribute to decree No. 77?

As regards decree No. 65 it appears that prior to that date three of the villages affected by that decree were sold by auction and Rs. 39,516 was thus realized. Whilst it is urged on behalf of the plaintiff that the balance of the decretal amount should be regarded as the sum for which the villages affected by decree No. 77 were liable, it is contended by the learned counsel for the defendant-appellant that the whole amount of decree No. 65 should be taken into account, inasmuch as the owners of the villages which were sold in execution of that decree were entitled to claim from the unsold villages contribution for the amount realized from their villages in excess of their legitimate share of liability, and consequently the unsold villages continued to be liable for the proportion of the decretal amount for which they were originally liable. The former contention has found favour with the Subordinate Judge, but in our opinion it is unsound and untenable. It is true that the mortgagee realized by the sale of some of the mortgaged villages a large portion of the decretal amount, and that under the decree itself the unsold villages were liable for the balance of that amount only. But, as the appellant rightly argues, the owners of the villages which were sold for the realization of the decretal amount were entitled to claim contribution from the unsold villages in respect of the amount realized from their villages in excess of that for which they were liable. As a matter of fact the owners of the villages which have been sold have brought suits for contribution and obtained decrees. [552] The unsold villages, therefore, continued to be liable, not only for the balance of the decretal amount, but also for the excess amounts contributed by the villages which were sold. So that the extent of their original liability remained the same. For this reason, the proportionate amount for which the unsold villages were liable under decree No. 65 should be calculated with reference to the full amount which would have been due under that decree on the 4th of July, 1874, had no sale taken place under it. We find from the office report printed at p. 3 of the respondent's book that Rs. 49,515-7-9 were due on the 10th of August, 1874. Excluding interest for the period between the 4th of July and the 10th of August, 1874, the amount payable on the 4th July 1874, was Rs. 49,233-7-9, or in round numbers Rs. 49,230, which we adopt for facility of calculation. The proportionate liability of the villages subject to the operation of decree No. 65 should be calculated with reference to the above amount.

As for decree No. 66, the parties are agreed that the amount due upon that decree on the 18th of July, 1874, was Rs. 20,283-13-3, as found by the Court below in its answer to the reference made by us under s. 566 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That date was referred to through an oversight. We hold that the amount due on the 4th of July, 1874, was Rs. 20,240 in round figures.

As we have said above, the plaintiff in preparing the statement showing the amounts of the rateable liability of each village, has not complied with the provisions of s. 82 of Act No. IV of 1882. He has altogether ignored the prior incumbrances existing on those villages on the date of the mortgage of the 4th of July, 1874. For preparing a correct statement the amount of liability of each village under decree No. 65 should have been first calculated. Then should have been calculated the amount for which the villages were liable under decree No. 66, and in doing so, the amount of the prior incumbrance to which those villages were subject under the mortgage which resulted in decree No. 65 should [553] have been deducted. The decree No. 66 was passed upon a mortgage bond, dated the 28th of April, 1873. The bond upon which decree No. 65 was made was dated the 12th of December, 1867, and was for Rs. 31,000 bearing interest at the rate of 12 annas per cent. per mensem. The suit in which the decree No. 65 was passed was instituted on the 22nd of July, 1873, and the amount of principal and interest claimed as due on that date was Rs. 44,155-8. The amount due on the 28th of April, 1873, the date of the bond on which decree No. 66 was founded, was therefore Rs. 43,500 in round figures. This is the amount of the prior incumbrance to which the villages affected by the decree No. 66 were subject on the 28th of April, 1873, and which should be deducted from the value of those villages. A statement prepared in this manner would have given the correct value of each village liable to contribute to decree No. 77 with reference to which its proportion of liability was to be apportioned.

There is no dispute between the parties as to the amount due upon the decree No. 77 on the 20th of August, 1879, the date on which the major portion of the plaintiff's villages were sold. That is the date with reference to which the plaintiff has made his calculations, and counsel for the appellant have consented to that date being adopted for convenience of calculation as the date on which the plaintiff became entitled to claim contribution.

The next question to be determined is whether the unrealized balance of the decree No. 77 should, as urged on behalf of the appellant, be treated as the amount contributed by the villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh to the discharge of the decree. It is stated that it was on the assumption that the purchase of those villages had discharged the amount of the balance, that no steps were taken to realize that balance by execution of the decree and that the appellant Raja Hari Raj Singh, who is now the holder of decree No. 77, is ready and willing to enter complete satisfaction of that decree. We are of opinion that the balance due upon the decree No. 77 should be treated as the [554] amount contributed by the villages purchased by the mortgagee decree-holder.

All the mortgaged villages were liable, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to contribute to the mortgage-debt in proportion to their value. The villages purchased by the mortgagee were therefore liable to bear their share of the debt. The mortgagee decree-holder was not entitled to take out execution of his decree without crediting towards the decretal amount the sum which represented that share: were he allowed to act otherwise, he would have the advantage of throwing the whole burden of the mortgage-debt on the mortgaged villages other than those purchased by himself and thus of relieving the villages last mentioned of the liability which s. 82 of Act No. IV of 1882 imposes on them. Those villages must therefore be held to have contributed the balance of the decretal amount as their quota of the debt. We are unable to accede to the contention of Mr. Sundar Lal, the learned counsel for the respondent, that by taking into account the whole amount of the decree in calculating the share of liability of the plaintiff's villages, the plaintiff has given credit for all that the mortgagee decree-holder is entitled to, and that if he be allowed to treat the balance of the decretal amount as the contribution of his villages he would get credit for that amount twice over. As we have said, each of the mortgaged villages was bound to bear its rateable share of the debt. The plaintiff's villages, equally with the villages purchased by the mortgagee, were liable for their share. The amount of the plaintiff's share has been realized by the sale of his villages. The amount contributed by the mortgagee to the discharge of his share is the balance due upon the decree. The mortgagee is therefore entitled to ask that, equally with the plaintiff, he should be allowed credit for the amount which his villages must be deemed to have contributed. By giving him credit for that amount we shall not be crediting him twice over with the same sum. The balance of the decretal amount appears from the statement filed by the plaintiff with his plaint to be Rs. 9,274-9-10, being the [555] difference between Rs. 86,071-9-10, the amount of the decree, and Rs. 76,797, the portion of it which has been realized by the sale of several villages, and the correctness of these figures has not been questioned.

This sum of Rs. 9,274-9-10 should be apportioned amongst the several villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh as the quota of contribution of each of them.

The only question which now remains to be considered is whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole amount contributed by his villages in excess of their own share of liability from such of the unsold villages as have not contributed either the full amount of their rateable share or a portion of that amount. In our judgment he is not entitled to do so. As we have said, unsold villages which have not contributed their full proportion of the debt afford the fund out of which the claims of all the persons who are entitled to contribution should be met. In this case the statement filed by the plaintiff himself shows that it is not the villages of the plaintiff only which have contributed more than their own quota, but that there are eight other villages which have made similar contributions. The owners of those villages are entitled to claim contribution equally with the plaintiff, and they also have to look to the fund to which we have referred above. If that fund is large enough to meet the claims of all, those claims must be satisfied in full, but if, by reason of some of the villages sold not realizing their full value at auction, the fund be insufficient fully to discharge all the claims, a rateable reduction must be made. In that case the claims will only be satisfied proportionately.

We have caused accounts to be prepared in the mode indicated above, one relating to decree No. 65, another to decree No. 66 and a third to decree No. 77. This last account shows that the plaintiff's villages contributed Rs. 14,421-1-10 in excess of the rateable amount for which they were liable under decree No. 77; and that other villages have similarly contributed Rs. 7,653-9-3 in excess of their share of liability. The owners of those villages were also entitled to claim contribution on the date of the [556] plaintiff's suit. The statement further shows that the fund which is available to all the persons whose villages have contributed in excess of their quota of the mortgage debt is Rs. 7,064-9-3, being the amount which the unsold villages have not contributed. The reason why this amount falls short of the sum necessary to recoup in full the owners of the villages which have contributed in excess of their quota, is that four of the villages, sold in execution of decree No. 77 realized much less than their proper value and did not contribute the full amount of their proportionate liability. Contribution, however, cannot, as we have said above, be claimed from them. The total amount which the plaintiff is entitled to recover from the unsold villages is Rs. 4,614-9-2. Out of this sum the villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh are liable for Rs. 2,195-12-1 and those purchased by Nand Kishore, Sundar Lal, Jugal Kishore and Dhanpat Rai are liable for Rs. 2,418-13-1. The plaintiff had not, however, claimed, probably by an oversight, to recover from Nathiwali, one of the villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh, but not sold in execution of decree No. 77, its share of liability for the amount due to the plaintiff. Therefore Rs. 87-9-4, the proportionate amount of liability of that village should be deducted from the Rs. 2,195-12-1 mentioned above, and the plaintiff will recover the balance of Rs. 2,108-2-9 from the remaining villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh, namely Begampur Haru, 2½ biswas, and the entire villages Kanrawala, Kadirganj, Murtazabad, Rajpur, Bhajrawala, and Kandiwala each village being declared liable for its own share out of that amount. He will similarly recover from the shares in the village Mansa purchased by

In our opinion the plaintiff is not entitled to obtain interest on those amounts, and the Court below has rightly rejected this part of his claim. He purchased the property in respect of which he claims contribution for the small sum of Rs. 500, and he has now advanced this claim for upwards of Rs. 36,000. He made the purchase evidently as a speculative bargain. The auction sale of [557] his villages in execution of decree No. 77 took place so far back as August, 1879, only a few months after his own purchase, and, although his right to claim contribution accrued in that month, he did not institute his suit until twelve years afterwards. Under such circumstances the Court below has, we consider, exercised a wise discretion in refusing to award interest to the plaintiff for the period prior to the date of the institution of the suit. For the period subsequent to that date till realization he should, in our opinion, obtain interest at 6 per cent. per annum.

The result is that we allow the appeal and vary the decree below by making a decree in favour of the plaintiff for recovery of Rs. 2,108-2-9 with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 20th of August 1891, the date of the institution of the suit, to the 1st of December 1897, which we hereby fix as the date for the payment of the amount decreed by us, or to the date of payment, if payment be made before the 1st of December 1897, together with proportionate costs here and in the Court below, by sale of the following villages purchased by Raja Shiu Raj Singh, the father of the defendant-appellant, namely, Begampur Haru, 2½ hiswas, and Kanrawala, Kadirganj Murtazabad, Rajpur, Bhajrawala and Kandi-wala, each village being liable to sale in the event of the proportionate amount of its liability not being paid on or before the 1st of December 1897. The decree will set forth the amount of the proportionate liability of each of the villages abovementioned for principal, interest and costs. The appellant Raja Hari Raj Singh will get his costs here and in the Court below proportionately to the portion of the claim dismissed as against him.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. ISHRI.* [2nd February, 1897.]

Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 35 and 367—Concurrent sentences not authorised by the Code.

There is no provision in the Code of Criminal Procedure by which a Court is empowered, on convicting an accused person of two or more offences at the same time, to direct that the sentences imposed in respect of such offences shall run concurrently.

THIS case was referred to a Bench at the instance of Aikman, J., in view of the rulings of the Court in Queen-Empress v. Wazir Jan (1) and Queen-Empress v. Dalip (2). The facts of the case, so far as they are necessary for the purposes of this report, appear from the order of the Court.

ORDER.

KNOX, BURKITT and AIKMAN, JJ.—This case was called for on a perusal of the Sessions statement of the Bareilly District for the month of October 1896. The Sessions Judge had convicted an accused person of separate offences falling under ss. 420, 467 and 471 of the Indian Penal Code. For each offence he sentenced the accused to suffer rigorous imprisonment for three months and directed that the sentences should run concurrently. The passing of concurrent sentences is nowhere authorised by the Code of Criminal Procedure. Section 35 of that Code provides that when a person is convicted at one trial of two or more distinct offences, the Court may sentence him for such offences to separate terms of imprisonment, but provides [2] that the separate terms of imprisonment shall commence one after the expiration of the other in such order as the Court may direct. These words show that the passing of concurrent sentences was not in the contemplation of the Legislature for cases in which convictions take place at one trial. Section 397 of the Code provides that in case of a person already undergoing a sentence of imprisonment and such person being sentenced to another term of imprisonment, such latter imprisonment shall commence at the expiration of the imprisonment to which he has been previously sentenced. We cannot but regret that a power to pass concurrent sentences has not been conferred by the Code.
Numerous cases occur to us in which such a power would be very salutary.
As the law at present stands, we must hold that the concurrent sentences passed are illegal. We accordingly set aside the sentences passed in this case, and direct that for each offence the accused suffer rigorous imprisonment for a term of one month. These terms of imprisonment will run consecutively from the date of the original conviction. Let the papers be returned.

NABBU KHAN (Plaintiff) v. SITA (Defendant)* [6th July, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 440 et seqq.—Lunatic—Act No XXXV of 1858—Lunatic, not adjudged to be so, may sue through a next friend or defend through a guardian ad litem.

The provisions of Chapter XXXI of the Code of Civil Procedure are not exhaustive, and where a person is admitted or has been found to be of unsound mind, although he has not been adjudged to be so under Act No. XXXV of 1858, or by any other law for the time being in force, he should, if a plaintiff, be allowed to sue through his next friend, and the Court should appoint a guardian ad litem where he is a defendant. Porter v. Porter (1), Venkat [3] Ramana Rambhat v. Timappa Devappa (2), Tukaram Anant Joshi v. Vilhal Joshi (3), Uma Sundari Dasi v. Ramji Haldar (4) and Jonnagadla Subbaya v. Thatiparthi Senadala Buthaya (5), referred to.

THE facts of this case are as follows: During the years 1887—1890 three sons of one Mendu Khan sold certain shops belonging to the family to Gajju Mal, and the deed of sale was signed also by one of the brothers on behalf of a fourth brother, Nabbu Khan, who was of unsound mind. In 1894 the present suit was brought by Nabbu Khan's aunt, Musammatt Chhoti, as his next friend to recover a one-fourth share in the shops sold on the ground that Nabbu Khan at the time of the sale had been insane and incapable of contracting. Nabbu Khan was admittedly insane and had been so from his birth, but he had never been adjudged a lunatic under Act No. XXXV of 1858.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Koil) decreed the claim, holding that, there being in fact no doubt as to the plaintiff's lunacy, there was no reason why he should not sue through a next friend, even though he had not been adjudged a lunatic.

The defendant (the representative of the original vendee) appealed. The lower appellate Court (District Judge of Aligarh) decreed the appeal, holding that it was necessary that the plaintiff should have been adjudged a lunatic under Act No. XXXV of 1858, and further because the plaintiff did not seek to recover possession of his share of the property on payment of a proportionate share of the purchase-money paid by the husband of the defendant-appellant. The plaintiff thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Lala Gulzari Lal, for the appellant.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought on behalf of one Nabbu Khan, who is alleged to be a lunatic, by his aunt, Musammatt Chhoti, as his next friend. Nabbu Khan has not been adjudged to be a [4] lunatic under Act

* Second Appeal, No 292 of 1895, from a decree of L. G. Evans, Esq., District Judge of Aligarh, dated the 4th December 1894, reversing a decree of Syed Abdur Razzak, Munsif of Koil, dated the 5th June 1894.

No. XXXV of 1858, but the lower appellate Court has found it to be an admitted fact that he is a lunatic. That Court has, however, held, on the authority of certain rulings to which it has referred, that s. 440 and the following sections of the Code of Civil Procedure are, with reference to the provisions of s. 463, inapplicable to the case of a lunatic not adjudged to be so, and that therefore the aunt is not competent to sue on his behalf as his next friend. On this ground and on another ground, to which we shall refer hereafter, the learned Judge has dismissed the suit.

It is contended, in this second appeal which has been preferred on behalf of Nabbu Khan, that the fact that he was not adjudged a lunatic does not render the suit brought by him through a guardian an invalid suit. In our opinion this contention must prevail.

By s. 463 of the Code of Civil Procedure the provisions of ss. 440 to 462 are made applicable to the case of persons of unsound mind adjudged to be so. But that section does not, in our opinion, forbid the institution of a suit by next friend on behalf of a person of unsound mind, who is in fact a lunatic, but has not been adjudged to be so, or the appointment of a guardian ad litem for the purpose of defending a suit brought against such a person. It is true, as held in Uma Sundari Dasi v. Ramji Haldar (1), that, so long as a person has not been adjudged to be of unsound mind, he cannot be deemed to have lost his civil rights and to be consequently incompetent to sue in his own name. But from this it does not follow that a person who is really of unsound mind, but has not been declared to be so, cannot sue through a next friend or defend a suit through a guardian ad litem. If we were to hold that a person of unsound mind is not entitled to sue by a next friend or defend by a guardian ad litem until he has been adjudged to be a lunatic, serious failure of justice might result. For example, if a trespasser were doing irremediable damage to the property of a lunatic, the interests [5] of the latter could not promptly be protected and the trespass could not be restrained by suit till an adjudication had been obtained that he was of unsound mind. Similarly if a lunatic causes serious injury to another, the latter will not be in a position to sue the lunatic without getting him declared to be so. And if he be allowed to sue the lunatic without getting a guardian appointed for the suit, the lunatic will be seriously prejudiced, as the fact of his being of unsound mind will prevent him from defending the action. As observed by Bowen, L. J., in Porter v. Porter (2):—"When there is a person of unsound mind, who, although not found to be of unsound mind by inquisition, nevertheless stands in need of the protection or the intervention of the Court as regards his property, real or personal, or as regards any portion of his property, then, supposing he would, if sane, be entitled to the intervention of the Court, a third person, a stranger, may come forward and do that which is clearly for the benefit of the person of weak mind. It is obvious that in the absence of the principal person who is concerned his property ought to be left, as far as possible, and so far as his interest does not render the opposite thing necessary to be done, in the condition in which it was—quieta non movere. But still, if it is for his protection and for his obvious benefit, then the Court ought to interfere to give him, while his senses are sleeping, the same sort of protection to which he would be entitled if his senses were awake and he could act for himself." These observations state in more forcible terms than we can employ, the reasons which ought to induce a Court to permit a person of unsound mind, although not adjudged to be so, to sue or defend through his next friend or his guardian ad litem, as the case may be. In our opinion the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure are not in this respect exhaustive, and we hold that if a person be admitted or found to be of unsound mind, although he has not been adjudged to be so under Act No. XXXV of 1858, or any other law for the time being in force, he should, if a plaintiff, be [6] allowed to sue through his next friend, and the Court should appoint a guardian ad litem where he is the defendant. This was the view of Sargent, C.J., and Birdwood, J., in Venkatramana Rambhat v. Timappa Devappa (1), and apparently of Jardine and Candy, JJ., in Tukaram Anant Joshi v. Vithal Joshi (2). In the former case it was held that "although s. 443 of the Code of Civil Procedure (XIV of 1882), read with s. 463, does not oblige a Court to appoint a guardian ad litem for a defendant of unsound mind except in the case where he has been adjudged to be of unsound mind under Act XXXV of 1858, still upon general principles and in conformity with the practice of the Court of Chancery, the Court should assign a guardian ad litem for the defendant if it finds on inquiry that he is of unsound mind so as to be unfit to defend the suit." In the latter case the learned Judges seem to have been of opinion that, irrespective of the provisions of Chapter XXXI of the Code of Civil Procedure the next friend of a person of unsound mind not so adjudicated could maintain a suit, if, having regard to the nature of the suit and "the principles of equity as applied in the practice of tribunals," such an action could be brought by a next friend. In the particular case before the learned Judges they referred to the rule stated in Daniell's Chancery Practice, 6th Edn., Vol. 1, p. 116. on the authority of Halfhide v. Robinson (3), namely, that "if the object of the action is to deal with the real estate of a person of unsound mind (as an action for partition or for sale in lieu thereof) the action cannot be brought by a next friend," and held that the suit, which was one for a partition of ancestral property, could not be maintained by the next friend of the lunatic. It has, however, been decided in the later case of Porter v. Porter (4), to which we have referred above, that an action which is prima facie for the benefit of a person of unsound mind (e.g., a partition action) may be brought by the next friend (Pope's Law and Practice of Lunacy, 2nd Edn., p. 325). So that [7] the rule on the subject in England is no longer the rule stated in Daniell's Chancery Practice.

In Jonnagadla Subbaya v. Thatiparthi Senadala Buthaya (5) all that was decided was that a guardian ad litem for a defendant who has not been declared to be a lunatic under Act No. XXXV of 1858 cannot be appointed under Chapter XXXI of the Code of Civil Procedure. We are, however, of opinion, for the reasons stated above, that upon general principles, and irrespective of the provisions of that chapter, a person of unsound mind, although not adjudged to be so, may sue by a next friend, and that a guardian for the suit for such a lunatic may be appointed by the Court.

In the case before us the claim is to recover possession of property alleged to belong to the lunatic Nabbu Khan which has been sold by his brothers. Such a suit is for the benefit of the lunatic, and could, in our opinion, be brought by his next friend. The Court below has erred in dismissing it on the ground that it could not be so brought. The lower appellate Court has also held the suit to be untenable on the ground that the sale was a bona fide one for adequate consideration, and that the plaintiff did not offer to pay a proportionate part of the purchase-money. In our opinion this was not a valid ground for dismissing the suit. The learned Judge ought to have found whether the lunatic had benefited by the sale. If he had not, the mere fact of the purchaser paying full value would not give him any title to the share of the lunatic, which the brothers of the lunatic had no right to sell, nor would that entitle the purchaser to a proportionate share of the purchase-money. Moreover, if it be found that the plaintiff, lunatic, benefited by the sale, that would not entail a dismissal of the suit, but the decree for possession should be made conditional upon his making restitution to the purchaser.

We allow the appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, remand the case to that Court under s. 562 [8] of the Code of Civil Procedure, with directions to re-admit it under its original number in the register and to try it on the merits. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Civil Procedure Code, s. 544—Appeal—Ground of appeal common to all the judgment-debtors—Reversal or modification of decree as against all on appeal by one only.

Section 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not enable an appellate Court to decide, upon a ground which it considers to be common to all the defendants, an appeal preferred by one only of such defendants, and to reverse or modify the decree of the Court below in favour of all the defendants, unless the lower Court has proceeded upon a ground common to all the defendants. It is only when the decree appealed against has proceeded upon a ground common to all the defendants, that is, when the Court below has made a decree against several defendants upon a finding which applies equally to all of them, that under s. 544 any one of the defendants may appeal against the whole decree and the appellate Court may reverse or modify that decree in favour of all the defendants. *Protab Chunder Dutt v. these persons only. Krant Singh, another son of Ajab Singh, intervened, under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and was added as a defendant. Ajab Singh did not enter an appearance. Umed Singh defended the suit by alleging that after the auction sale a compromise took place between him and the plaintiff, under which the plaintiff received [9] the purchase money from him and surrendered the property to him. Krant Singh's defence was to the effect that the property originally belonged to his grandmother Musammat Pohpa; that after her it passed to him, Krant Singh, and to his brothers Umed Singh and Dhaukkal Singh; that the plaintiff acquired by his auction-purchase only the one-third share of Umed Singh, and that his claim in respect of two-thirds of the property was untenable. The Court of first instance decreed the claim against all the three defendants. Neither Ajab Singh nor Umed Singh appealed, and they allowed the decree to become final as against them. Krant Singh alone preferred an appeal, and contended, first, that the plaintiff did not acquire more than a third share of the property by virtue of his auction-purchase; and, secondly, that under a private arrangement, which took place after his auction-purchase, the plaintiff withdrew from his purchase. He thus urged for the first time in appeal a ground which he had not taken in his defence in the Court of first instance. The lower appellate Court held this ground of appeal to be a valid one, and, purporting to act under s. 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it set aside the decree of the Court of first instance and dismissed the suit. The other grounds of appeal were not tried at all.

In my opinion the learned Judge has erred in applying s. 544 to this case. That section does not enable an appellate Court to decide upon a ground which it considers to be common to all the defendants, an appeal preferred by one only of such defendants, and to reverse or modify the decree of the Court below in favour of all the defendants, unless the lower Court has proceeded upon a ground common to all the defendants. It is only when the decree appealed against has proceeded upon a ground common to all the defendants, that is, when the Court below has made a decree against several defendants upon a finding which applies equally to all of them, that under s. 544 any one of the defendants may appeal against the whole decree and the appellate Court may [10] reverse or modify that decree in favour of all the defendants. This view is supported by the ruling of the Calcutta High Court in Protab Chunder Dutt v. Koorbannisa Bibee (1). In this case there was no ground common to the defence set up by Umed Singh and that put forward by Krant Singh. On the contrary, the case of the latter was inconsistent with that of the former. Whilst Umed Singh urged that the whole of the property claimed had been reconveyed to him by the plaintiff after the auction sale, Krant Singh contended that Umed Singh had no more than a third share in the property, and that the plaintiff had acquired that share only under his auction-purchase. The Court of first instance also considered the case of Umed Singh separately from that of Krant Singh. It held that Musammat Pohpa, the owner of the property had died before Krant Singh and Dhaukkal Singh were born and the property passed to Umed Singh alone. It found that the allegation made by Umed Singh that the plaintiff had surrendered the property to him on receipt of the sale consideration had not been proved. That Court therefore in making its decree did not proceed upon a ground common to all the defendants. Consequently Krant Singh was not competent to appeal against the whole decree and the lower appellate Court had no authority, under s. 544, to reverse or modify that decree in favour of all the defendants on the appeal of Krant Singh alone.

The Court has, in my opinion, erred in allowing Krant Singh to set up in appeal a case inconsistent with that put forward by him in the Court of first instance. As I have said above, his contention in the Munsif's Court was that Umed Singh owned only a one-third share in the property, and that consequently the plaintiff's claim for the remaining two-thirds of the property was untenable. Inconsistently with that defence he urged in appeal that the plaintiff had no right whatever to the property, inasmuch as he had withdrawn from his auction-purchase. This last contention suggests that the plaintiff had purchased the [11] whole property. Such an inconsistent plea he could not be allowed to raise in appeal, and the lower appellate Court ought not to have considered that plea and to have decided the appeal with reference to that plea.

I would allow the appeal as between the parties to it, and, setting aside the decree below, remand the case to the lower appellate Court under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a trial of the other questions raised in the appeal before that Court. The appellant will get his costs of this appeal.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur in the judgment of my brother Banerji and in the decree proposed by him. As this appeal is allowed "as between the parties to it," it will not affect any benefit which the defendants to the suit who are not parties to it may have obtained by the decree of the lower appellate Court.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Act No. VII of 1870 (Court Fees Act), ss. 12 and 28—Court fee—Finality of decision of Court on question of Court fee.

The decision of the Court on a question of the Court fee payable on a plaint or memorandum of appeal which is to be "final as between the parties to the suit" must be a decision made between the parties on the record and after they have had an opportunity of being heard, and not a decision based upon the report of a Munsarim before the plaint or memorandum of appeal is filed and therefore before any parties are before the Court.

Hence where a Court of first instance held on the report of the Munsarim that a plaint presented to it had been insufficiently stamped, but subsequently, both parties being before the Court and arguments having been heard, decided that the Court fee originally paid was sufficient; it was held that the latter decision was the decision which was final as between the parties within the meaning of s. 12 of the Court Fees Act, 1870.

[12] THE plaintiffs in this case sued for pre-emption in respect of a sale deed executed on the 19th of October 1892. Their plaint was presented in the Court of the Subordinate Judge on the 16th of November 1893, the first day on which the Court was open after the Dasserah vacation. On that day the Munsarim reported that the Court fees paid on the plaint were insufficient, and that the plaint required to be amended in respect of a claim for redemption. Upon this report the Court on the same day ordered that the plaint should be returned for amendment, and directed that it should be presented again, amended, and with the deficient Court fee duty, within four days. On the following day (November 17th) the plaintiffs appeared before the Subordinate Judge and objected to his order in the matter of the Court fee payable on their plaint. They contended that the amount of Court fees they had paid was sufficient, but at the same time they brought into Court the additional amount they had been ordered to pay, and submitted themselves to the order of the Court as to whether it should be paid or not. They also pointed out that they had not made any claim for redemption. On this petition the Court ordered the deficient Court fee duty to be paid, which was done, and the plaint was then admitted and registered and summonses were served on the defendants. The Court either disregarded or countermanded its order as to returning the plaint for amendment, and the case proceeded to a hearing without amendment. At the hearing of the suit the defendants raised the objection that the suit was barred by limitation, the plaint not having been properly stamped when presented on the 16th November, and the deficiency not having been made good within time. The Court, having heard arguments on this point, reconsidered its former ex parte decision, and held that the Court fee originally paid on the plaint was sufficient. The suit was ultimately dismissed on the merits.

The plaintiffs appealed, and the defendants preferred an objection under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure raising the same point of limitation. The lower appellate Court (District [13] Judge of Agra) allowed the objection and dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by limitation.

The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Mr. D. N. Benerji, for the appellants.

Mr. T. Conlan and Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J.—The suit in which this second appeal has arisen is one for pre-emption. The sale-deed on which the cause of action for pre-emption is alleged to have arisen bears date of the 19th of October 1892. The plaint was presented in the Court of the Subordinate Judge on November 16th, 1893, the first day on which the Court was open after the Dasserah vacation. Therefore, so far as the day on which it was presented is concerned, the plaint was within limitation under s. 5 of the Limitation Act. On November 16th, the Court Munsarim reported that the Court fees paid on the plaint were insufficient and that the plaint required to be amended in respect of a claim for redemption. On this report the Court on the same day ordered that the plaint should be returned for amendment, and directed that it should be presented again, amended and with the deficient Court fee duty, within four days. Now in passing that order the Subordinate Judge exceeded his powers, as has been held in the case of Jainti Prasad v. Bacchu Singh (1). The last day of the limitation period during which the plaint could have been presented so as to be a valid plaint was November 16th, 1893. If the plaint as presented on that day was not sufficiently stamped, and if the deficient duty were not paid on that day, it was not a valid plaint. The Subordinate Judge had no power to extend the period of limitation provided by Act No. XV of 1877 by permitting the intending plaintiffs to pay in the deficient court fee after November 16th. The case is not one to which the proviso to s. 28 of the Court Fees Act applies, and therefore no payment subsequent to November 16th of any deficient court fees could validate the plaint. As matter of fact the plaint was not returned to the plaintiffs, for on the following day (November 17th) they appeared [14] before the Subordinate Judge and put in a petition in which they objected to his order as to the amount of court fees paid on the plaint being insufficient. They contended that the amount of the court fees they had paid was sufficient, but at the same time they brought into Court the additional amount they had been ordered to pay and submitted themselves to the order of the Court as to whether it should be paid or not. They also pointed out that they had not made any claim for redemption. On this petition the Court ordered the deficient court fee duty to be paid, which was done, and the plaint was then admitted and registered, and summonses were served on the defendants. The Court either disregarded or countermanded its order as to returning the plaint for amendment, and the case proceeded to a hearing without amendment.

One of the pleas taken by the defendants at the hearing was that the suit was barred by limitation. Their contention was that the plaint as presented on November 16th, 1893, was not a valid plaint, as it was not sufficiently stamped, and that as the deficient duty was not paid till the following day, when the limitation period had expired, there was not before the Court any valid plaint to which they could be called on to plead. The plaintiffs replied that the Court fees paid originally on the plaint on November 16th were sufficient, and that the Court had acted erroneously in compelling them to pay a larger sum. They contended that the plaint as presented on November 16th was a valid plaint. On these pleadings the Subordinate Judge, having heard argument on an issue as to whether the suit was barred by limitation or not, decided that it was not so barred, holding that the stamp duty paid on November 16th was sufficient, that the plaint was "legal and valid" on the day on which it was presented, and that "subsequent proceedings cannot invalidate a valid plaint." The suit was ultimately dismissed on the merits.

On appeal by the plaintiffs the defendants put in an objection under s. 561 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Their contention was that the Subordinate Judge was wrong in holding [15] that the suit was not time-barred and that the plaint was properly stamped when presented on November 16th. The District Judge on these pleas held that "the plaint being insufficiently stamped on November 16th was not a plaint," and that that day being the last day of limitation, the Subordinate Judge was not competent to give time to amend the plaint or make good the deficiency. The learned Judge further gave his reasons for holding that the plaint when presented was insufficiently stamped.

On second appeal to this Court the case has been referred to a Bench of three Judges. Before us the case has been almost entirely argued on the effect of the words "such decision shall be final as between the parties to the suit" in s. 12 of the Court Fees Act, a point which apparently was not raised before the District Judge, and which, I must say, is not in so many words taken in the memorandum of appeal to this Court. The section cited above provides that "every question relating to valuation for the purpose of determining the amount of any fee chargeable under this chapter on a plaint or a memorandum of appeal shall be decided by the Court in which such plaint or memorandum, as the case may be, is filed, and such decision shall be final as between the parties to the suit." The question we have to decide is—which of the orders passed by the Subordinate Judge in this case is the "decision" which is to be considered "final" under s. 12.

Putting aside as immaterial the order passed on November 17th, it being merely a repetition of the order passed on the 16th, there are two orders which we have to consider. The first is the order of November 16th, by which the Subordinate Judge held that the plaint was not sufficiently stamped and directed the deficient duty to be made good within four days. It is admitted that if that order is the "decision" which s. 12 makes final as between the parties, the case is at an end, the plaint not having been stamped within limitation to the amount required by that order. The second order is that passed at the hearing of an issue raised between the parties, by which it was held that the plaint when presented was sufficiently stamped, and so was a valid plaint. [16] If that order be the "decision" referred to in s. 12 of the Court Fees Act, it is admitted that this appeal must so far be allowed.

In my opinion the latter of the two orders must be considered to be the "decision" referred to in s. 12 of the Court Fees Act. To hold otherwise would, it appears to me, be most unjust and productive of hardship in many cases. The first order was not one passed between the parties. Indeed on November 16th, when that order was passed, there can hardly be said to have been any parties or any suit. The plaint had not been admitted nor registered, and the defendants had not been summoned. I find it difficult to understand how a decision can be arrived at, which will be final as between parties, at the making of which practically neither party was heard. On the presentation of the plaint, all that happened was that the Munsarim made a report to the Court which the Court adopted, apparently without even calling on the plaintiffs. On the following day, when the plaintiffs did contest the correctness of the order as to the insufficiency of the court fees, it was too late, limitation having expired, and, according to the respondents' contention, this decision, though passed without hearing either party, is final and deprives the plaintiffs of all redress. I am unable to believe that the Legislature intended the word "decision" to be so interpreted. I cannot think that it was intended to mean a mere ex parte order by the Court, passed without argument and in the absence at least of one of the parties—the defendants. I take it that in a case in which the defendants have appeared and in which one or other side challenges the correctness of the court fees paid on the plaint, in that case the Court will have jurisdiction, and will be bound, to decide the question of valuation as between the parties, and may conceivably take a view different from that which it took when the plaint was presented and before it was admitted and registered. The latter order is, in my opinion, simply an interlocutory order which the Court may vary as long as it has seisin of the case. In this connection the word "filed" used in s. 12 is significant. [17] That word certainly means something more than "presented" for admission. It implies that the plaint or memorandum of appeal has been admitted and put on the files of the Court. That is the sense in which the same word is used in s. 28 of the Court Fees Act, and I see no reason why I should give a different meaning to it in s. 12. And indeed the words of the section read in their natural and literal sense are wholly inapplicable to a case in which the plaint had not been filed, and in which there was therefore no existing suit, and no parties to such suit. To accept the opposite construction, the section would have to be read "is presented for admission and filing" and "such decision shall be final as between the persons intended to be impleaded in a suit sought to be instituted." I know no principle of law which would justify so unnatural a construction.

When the Legislature intends to confer the status of finality upon an ex parte decision, it does so in plain and explicit terms as in s. 5 of the Court Fees Act. In the absence of clear and unequivocal language to the contrary, I must hold that a decision to be "final as between the parties" must be a judicial decision upon a hearing in which the general judicial maxim of "Audi alteram partem" has been observed. If then, a plaint or memorandum of appeal has been so "filed," (and under the Rules of this Court it cannot be so filed without a report by the Munsarim that the court fees paid on it are sufficient) it surely would be open to the defendant at the hearing to contend that the fees paid were insufficient, and that for that reason the plaint on the files of the Court was not a valid plaint. On deciding such a plea—as is the case here—the Court would in my opinion come to the "decision," which, under the wording of s. 12 of the Court Fees Act, would be final as between the parties. As an illustration I would take a case in which Rs. 10 was the amount of court fees legally chargeable on a plaint, but in which from ignorance the Munsarim reported to the Court that Rs. 1,000 ought to have been paid, and that the Court adopted and acted on that report. If then the plaintiff pay that sum—as indeed he [18] must do or have his plaint rejected—surely the defendant at the hearing would be entitled to plead that the proper court fee chargeable on the plaint was Rs. 10, and that he—if the decree went against him—ought not to have to pay the extra Rs. 990 in costs. I certainly hold that he could ask the Court to decide the valuation for court fees chargeable on the plaint, and to hold that it had acted erroneously in calling on the plaintiff to pay the Rs. 990, and that the plaintiff, if successful in obtaining a decree, could not recover that sum as part of the costs. This no doubt would be hard on the plaintiff who simply obeyed the order of the Court, but the defendant would not be in fault, and the plaintiff would not be entitled to pass the loss on to the defendant and to make him responsible for the mistake of the Court.

In the above observations I desire to guard myself against its being supposed that in this judgment I have had in my contemplation any of the cases under s. 54 of the Code of Civil Procedure in which the Court may reject a plaint. None of these cases come within the scope of the present appeal.

Some argument was addressed to us on an analogy which it was sought to draw from the practice of the High Court in cases under s. 3 of the Court Fees Act. The procedure enjoined by statute and the practice of the High Court and of the District Court is, however, so very different in those matters that no useful analogy can be drawn from them.

For all the above reasons I am of opinion that the order passed by the Court of first instance at the hearing of the suit on March 12th, 1894, was the "decision" which, under s. 12 of the Court Fees Act, is final as between the parties.

I would therefore allow this appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, I would remand the case under the s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure for a decision on the merits, the lower appellate Court having decided the suit on a preliminary point. NAND LAL (Plaintiff) v. BANSHI (Defendant).
[7th July, 1897.]

Pre-mortgage—Wazib-ul-arz—Co-sharer—Mortgagee of a co-sharer not himself a co-sharer.

Two co-sharers in a village. A and G. mortgaged their proprietary interest, with possession, to L. L made either an assignment or a sub-mortgage of her interest under the mortgage for a term of twenty years to B, with a foreclosure clause in case of non-payment. B afterwards transferred to X for an unexpired period of sixteen years and eleven months the interest in the property which he had acquired from L. One N L, a co-sharer in the village, thereupon brought a suit for pre-mortgage in respect of the transfer to X, on the basis of the village wajib-ul-arz, which gave a right of pre-emption or pre-mortgage when the share of a co-sharer should be sold or mortgaged.

Held, that, inasmuch as B could not be regarded as a co-sharer, no right of pre-mortgage arose in favour of N L in respect of the transfer of the mortgagee interest from B to X. The principle laid down in Khair-un-nissa Bibi v. Amin Bibi (1) and in Ali Ahmad v. Rahmat-ul-lah (2) followed.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J :—The question we have to decide in Full Bench in this second appeal has arisen in the following manner. Two co-sharers named Asa and Gopal mortgaged their proprietary interest with possession to

* Second Appeal No. 338 of 1896, from a decree of Munshi Mata Prasad, Subordinate Judge of Banda, dated the 3rd February 1896, reversing a decree of Babu Jailal, Munsif of Hamirpur, dated the 3rd December 1896.

Musammat Laria. The latter made [20] either an assignment or a sub-mortgage of her interest under the mortgage for a term of twenty years to one Baldeo, with a foreclosure clause in case of non-payment. Baldeo afterwards transferred for an unexpired period of sixteen years and eleven months to the defendant-respondent Bansi the interest in the property which he had acquired from Musammat Laria. It is unnecessary to decide whether the instrument of transfer in his favour was an assignment by conditional sale of a mortgage or was a sub-mortgage. The plaintiff-appellant, Nand Lal, being a co-sharer in the village, thereupon instituted this suit for pre-emption, or rather pre-mortgage, under the terms of the village, wajib-ul-arz, which gives a right of pre-emption and of pre-mortgage when the share of a co-sharer is sold or mortgaged.

Now it is admitted that neither Musammat Laria nor her assignee Baldeo, nor Baldeo's assignee Bansi, is a co-sharer in the village. They are all of them strangers. It is also admitted that the plaintiff made no attempt to assert his alleged rights when the first or the second alienations were made.

The question we have to decide is—did the third transfer noted above give to the plaintiff-appellant any cause of action on which he could maintain the present suit? The contention for the appellant is that a mortgagee in possession of the share of a co-sharer is ipso facto a co-sharer, and that if he give an assignment of his mortgage or execute a sub-mortgage to one who is not a co-sharer, the same result ensues as in the case of an alienation by a co-sharer.

In my opinion that contention is unsound and cannot be supported. A co-sharer, even though he has mortgaged with possession his interest in the mahal, and so has temporarily abandoned his right to actual possession of the land, is still nevertheless a co-sharer. As such he continues to enjoy many privileges in the village. He continues to be recorded in the khewat as proprietor, and above all he retains the right of redemption. No doubt the mortgagee in possession has by contract or by statute many of the rights, and is subject to many of the liabilities, of his mortgagor. [21] For instance, he may be entitled to sue the tenants for rent, if such be the condition of the mortgage, and he may be liable to pay Government revenue. But to my mind these very facts prove that the mortgagee in possession cannot be considered to be in law a co-sharer. For if that were his legal status, then it would require neither a contractual agreement nor any statutory provision to confer on him those rights or to render him subject to those liabilities. The vakil who appeared for the appellant was logically compelled to go so far as to contend that a lessee for a few days or weeks or months in possession of a portion, however small, of a co-sharer's property became ipso facto a co-sharer. Such a position is quite untenable. Indeed, to accede to the contention of the appellant would be in many cases to defeat the whole object of the law of pre-emption. A co-sharer in the proprietary rights of a mahal would have only to let in as mortgagee with possession or as lessee for some limited time a perfect stranger, and then on the strength of that limited right the mortgagor or lessor might sell to him as a co-sharer his mortgagor or lessor rights, and thus by two separate steps confer upon him the whole of such mortgagor's or lessor's rights in the property, which he could not by law have conferred upon him by one single grant so long as any co-sharer chose to exercise his pre-emptive right. Such a contention to be successful must be supported by a strong consensus of authority.

In support of the appellant's contention the case of Salik Sahu v. Jafar Ali (1) was cited. In that case it was held that "the term 'co-sharer' must be taken to mean the transferee for the time being of a co-sharer's interest." I am unable to concur in that dictum if it is to be taken as one of general applicability, though it may have been correct in the case in which it was pronounced. For I notice that in that case the defendants-respondents were co-sharers, who had alienated by conditional sale to a stranger a portion of a share which they had acquired by enforcing their own pre-emptive rights as co-sharers against one Ishri Singh, another [22] co-sharer. They clearly offended against the wajib-ul-arz none the less because the property which they alienated to a stranger had come into their hands by pre-emption from a stranger to whom another co-sharer had alienated it. I do not consider that case as being of any authority in the present appeal. The case of Lachman Singh v. Ghasi (2), cited for the appellant, does no more than lay down that mortgagees in possession liable to pay Government revenue may be sued by the lambardar under the Rent Act. The case of Ganga Prasad v. Chunni Lal (3) is not at all in point.

On the other hand in Khair-un-nissa Bibi v. Amin Bibi (4) it was held that a Muhammadan widow in possession, under an order of Court, of a share in the village in lieu of dower was not a co-sharer within the meaning of the wajib-ul-arz, and was not competent to maintain a suit for pre-emption as a co-sharer. The Court in deciding that case remarked that such a person "cannot be in a better position than that of a mortgagee in possession," meaning of course that a mortgagee in possession was not a co-sharer. The last case to which I would refer is that of Ali Ahmad v. Rahmat-ul-lah (5), in which the Court, after deciding that a certain document was a mortgage by conditional sale, the term of which had not expired, went on to remark that the "plaintiff (the conditional vendor) had not by reason of the mortgage ceased to be a shareholder in the village, and that he was not by reason of his having mortgaged his share in the village disentitled to maintain this suit for pre-emption." The above two cases show that a mortgagee in possession is not a co-sharer, and that a co-sharer who has mortgaged his interest, even by conditional sale, still remains a co-sharer and continues to enjoy the privileges of that status, and amongst others the right of pre-emption. In the rule laid down in those cases I fully concur.

Turning now to the present case I hold that the original mortgagors, Asa and Gopal, did not, by reason of the mortgage they executed in favour of Musammatt Laria, lose the status of [23] co-sharers in respect of the mortgaged property, and that neither Musammatt Laria nor her assignee (or sub-mortgagee) Baldeo became a co-sharer by virtue of their respective mortgages. When therefore Baldeo assigned or sub-mortgaged to Bansi, that which he transferred was not a co-sharer's interest, but an assignment of a mortgage of (or a sub-mortgage of) an interest executed by a stranger and not by a co-sharer. To such an alienation the terms of the wajib-ul-arz do not, in my opinion, apply. I would therefore affirm the decree of the lower Court and would dismiss this appeal with costs.

Act No. IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), s. 60—Mortgage—Purchase by mortgagee of portion of the mortgaged property—Mortgage not thereby necessarily extinguished.

The purchase of a part of the mortgaged property by a mortgagee, subject to his mortgage, has not necessarily the effect of fully discharging the mortgage, without regard to the value of the property purchased and the price paid for it, whether such purchase be made in execution of a simple decree for money or in execution of a decree obtained by the mortgagee himself upon a subsequent mortgage, although it is possible that under some circumstances such purchase may have the effect of extinguishing the mortgage.

THIS was a reference to a Full Bench of a question which is thus stated in the referring order:—

"In this case certain villages were mortgaged to the same person, namely, Raja Sheoraj Singh, the predecessor in title of the respondents, under two mortgages, upon which decrees for sale were obtained. One of the decrees is No. 66, and the other is No. 77. The latter decree was obtained upon a mortgage of date subsequent to that of the mortgage upon which the other decree was passed. A portion of the property mortgaged under decree No. 66, was purchased by the mortgagee in execution of a simple money decree. Another portion of the mortgaged property, which was subject to both the mortgages, was sold in execution of decree No. 77, and was purchased by the decree-holder mortgagee.

"The question has been raised whether these purchases had the effect of fully discharging decree No. 66, without regard to the value of the property sold and the price paid for it by the purchaser."

Mr. T. Conlan and Pāndit Moti Lal, for the appellant.

The following judgments were delivered :—

JUDGMENTS.

KNOX, J.—Two questions have been referred to us for decision. The form in which they have been referred admits of some improvement. They may be set out as follows:—(1) Does the purchase at a Court auction-sale (held in execution of a simple money decree) by a mortgagee of part of the property covered by the mortgage-deed have the effect of fully discharging the whole mortgage debt, without regard to the value of the property [25] sold and the price paid for it by the purchaser? (2) Does the purchase at a Court auction-sale (held in execution of a decree obtained upon a subsequent mortgage-deed) by the mortgagee of part of the property covered by a mortgage-deed of earlier date held by the same mortgagee, have the effect of fully discharging the whole of the prior mortgage debt without regard to the value of the property sold and the price paid for the purchase?

The authority for holding that either of the above purchases would extinguish the whole mortgage debt is to be found in a case decided by this Court—Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (1).

In that case the mortgagee purchaser held a decree enforcing a mortgage in his favour over several properties. One of these properties was put up for sale in execution of another decree against the original mortgagor, and the mortgagee, finding this, had it notified that the property advertized was being sold subject to the mortgage which he held, and at the sale which followed himself became the purchaser. He then sought to enforce his decree against the rest of the mortgaged property.

It was held that the fact of the purchase made by him of the portion of the property subject to his mortgage lien extinguished the mortgage debt in toto.

No principle of law is laid down as being the principle upon which this judgment proceeded. The judges contented themselves with setting out what appeared to be the facts of the case, and then without any further reason laid down the law which they considered applicable.

But it will be found that this judgment stands quite alone and is in conflict with the view held by this Court from 1866 to 1897, and by other Courts in a large number of reported cases, which under similar circumstances recognize the prior mortgage debt as still subsisting, and go on to lay down the principles upon which the mortgagor or a purchaser or assignee from the mortgagor of the equity of redemption over the whole or portion of [26] the remaining mortgaged property, may redeem such property or portion of it, a result which, it is needless to say, is quite incompatible with the conclusion that the prior mortgage debt is extinguished by the fact of the mortgagee purchasing a portion of the mortgaged property subject to the prior incumbrance.

In Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Sing (2) their Lordships of the Privy Council held that the appellant, who was transferee of the interest of the original mortgagee, and who had subsequently become the owner by purchase of the equity of redemption in twelve and three-quarters of the sixteen mauzas of which the mortgaged property was comprised, if desirous of retaining possession of the villages (in which he had not purchased the equity of redemption) as mortgagee, was entitled to do so against the plaintiff who had purchased the equity of redemption in one of the villages (Hosseinpore) and that the plaintiff's right in that case was limited to the redemption and recovery of Hosseinpore upon payment of so much of the sum as represented the portion of the mortgage debt chargeable on that village.

(1) 3 A. W. N. (1883) 61.

(2) 13 M. I. A. 404.

The same principles were again laid down by the Privy Council in Nilakant Banerji v. Suresh Chandra Mullick (1).

So far back as the year 1867, in Mahtab Singh v. Misree Lall and Mussamat Soondur (2), this Court held that a mortgagee is entitled to say to each of several persons who have succeeded to the mortgagor's interests that he shall not be entitled to redeem a part of the property on payment of part of the debt, because the whole and every part of the land mortgaged is liable for the whole debt. But it does not follow from this that a mortgagee who has acquired by purchase a part of the mortgagor's rights and interests, is entitled to throw the whole burden of the mortgage debt on the remaining portion of the equity of redemption in the hands of one who has purchased it at a sale in execution of a decree against the mortgagor. Each has bought subject to a proportionate share of the burden and must discharge it. [27] It will be further seen from the cases cited below that, so far from any inclination to hold that the mortgage debt was discharged by the fact of the mortgagee purchasing a portion of the mortgaged property under such circumstances as are set out in the reference, this Court has consistently, with the one reported exception of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (3), held that the mortgage debt still subsisted, if not satisfied by the mortgagee's purchase, and had to be satisfied by any one seeking to redeem the remainder of the property. See Bitthul Nath v. Toolsee Ram (4); Kesree v. Seth Roshun Lal (5); Kuray Mal v. Puran Mal (6), Mahtab Rai v. Sant Lal (7). In the very recent cases of Sumera Kuar v. Bhagwant Singh (8) and Chunna Lal v. Anandi Lal (9) the same principle has been re-affirmed.

The law laid down in the above cases appears to have found a place in the last clause of s. 60 of the Transfer of Property Act, wherein it is provided that nothing in s. 60 shall entitle a person interested in a share only of the mortgaged property to redeem his own share only, on payment of a proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, except where a mortgagee, or if there are more mortgagees than one, all such mortgagees, has or have acquired, in whole or in part, the share of a mortgagor.

Where the mortgagee or mortgagees has or have acquired in part the share of a mortgagor, a person interested in a share only of the mortgaged property is entitled to redeem his own share only on payment of a proportionate part of the amount remaining due on the mortgage, a clear recognition that the mortgage debt in part still subsists.

Several cases to the same effect will be found in the reported decisions of other High Courts.

The learned counsel for the appellant made some show of relying upon the case of the Khwaja Bakhsh v. Imaman (1) as an [28] authority in favour of his client; but in that case the mortgagee held two incumbrances over the same property and brought it to sale in execution of the puisne incumbrance after notifying that the sale was being made subject to the prior incumbrance. It was rightly held that the purchase, having been made subject to the prior incumbrance held by the purchaser himself, operated by the rule of merger to extinguish the prior incumbrance, there being no intervening equities in the case.

The same remarks apply to the case of Billam Das v. Amar Raj (2) which was decided upon the same principles.

These cases are perfectly distinct from the cases previously cited.

* [We have no hesitation therefore in holding that the precedent Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (3), must be overruled in answering both the questions submitted to us in the negative.

We direct that with this answer the record be returned to the Bench which made the reference.]

BURKITT, J.—I concur with my brother Knox and have nothing to add to his judgment.

BLAIR, J.—The plaintiff-appellant represents the mortgagor interests and the respondent-defendant the mortgagee interests in this suit. The question referred to us is whether the mortgagees by purchasing certain portions of the mortgaged property sold in execution of money decrees have thereby extinguished their mortgages over the whole of such property. In other words—does the confluence of the mortgagor and mortgagee interests in one person in a part of the property included in a mortgage or mortgages, operate as an extinguishment of the mortgagee's interests in the entire property?

The first case cited for the appellant was that of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (3). It boldly answers the question in the affirmative. The learned Judges give no reason and rely upon no authority. No doubt their decision was based on the general doctrine of the indivisibility of mortgages. That case was professedly followed by a Division Bench of this Court (including one of the judges who decided it) in the case of Khwaja Bakhsh v. Imaman (1). The reason given in the judgment was that the mortgagee-purchaser bought at a sale at which the prior [29] incumbrance was notified, and must therefore be taken to have bought at a price in which the amount of the notified incumbrance must have been taken into account. Apparently the learned Judges failed to observe the distinction between the case they were deciding and the case they supposed themselves to be following. The decision in Khwaja Baksh seems to me open to no exception, and is certainly no authority for the proposition that the purchase by a mortgagee of part of the mortgaged property does per se extinguish the whole mortgage. What was purchased in Khwaja Baksh v. Imaman was the whole and not part of the mortgaged property. To reconcile the principle upon which the two cases were decided, we should have to suppose that in the case of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain, the Judges were of opinion that the whole amount of the notified incumbrance must have been taken by the bidders to have been exigible from that part of the mortgaged property so sold and bought. If that doctrine were universally applied, the result would be that if several parts of the mortgagor's equity of redemption were sold separately with notice of the incumbrance in execution of separate money decrees, and the purchasers were each one to take into consideration in the price paid, the amount of the whole incumbrance, the mortgagor would be mulcted in the amount of the whole incumbrance just as many times as there were sales. E converso, if the mortgagee were the purchaser in one of such sales and paid a price in which the whole value of his incumbrance was deducted from the price he would have paid in the absence of incumbrance, then it would only be equitable to hold that his incumbrance was discharged by such purchase. In Khwaja Bakhsh v. Imaman, the equity bought was co-extensive with the property mortgaged: that case therefore furnishes no answer to the question put to us.

The case of Ballam Das v. Amar Raj (1) appears simply to have followed the two previous rulings which I have discussed; but the Court apparently did not notice the distinction between [30] them. To the decision in that case in my opinion no just exception can be taken, but it is no authority for the much larger proposition contended for by the appellant.

Indeed both these later cases are consistent with the principle laid down by the Lords of the Privy Council in Nawab Azimut Ali Khan v. Jowahir Singh (2). It is remarkable that each of the Judges who decided the case of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain has lent the weight of his authority to some other decision, the principle of which it seems practically impossible to reconcile with the judgment in that case. Vide the case of Bisheshar Singh v. Laik Singh (3) and that of Ballam Das v. Amar Raj (1).

The later judgments of this Court have consistently followed the principle of allocating to each part of a divided equity an ad valorem share of the mortgage debt to which the whole property is subject. The Calcutta rulings are to the same effect. A vast preponderance of authority based, as it seems to me, upon sound considerations of justice and equity, constrains me to answer the question put to us in the negative. It is not in my opinion a sound general principle of law that the purchase by a mortgagee at a sale under a decree of part of the mortgaged property extinguishes the mortgagee's rights against the whole.

BANERJI, J.—The question referred to us is substantially this:—Has the purchase of a part of the mortgaged property by a mortgagee, subject to his mortgage, the effect of fully discharging the mortgage without regard to the value of the property purchased and the price paid for it, whether such purchase be made in execution of a simple decree for money or in execution of a decree obtained by the mortgagee himself upon a subsequent mortgage?

My answer to the question is that such purchase does not necessarily discharge the mortgage in full and extinguish it. As I said in my judgment in Chunna Lal v. Anand Lal (4) "such purchase has in some instances the effect of discharging the whole of the mortgage debt, but I am unable to hold that it has that [31] effect in every case." If a part of the mortgaged property be acquired by a sole mortgagee, or by all the mortgagees where there are more mortgagees than one, the integrity of the mortgage is thereby broken up and the owner of the remainder of the property becomes entitled to redeem his own share upon payment of a proportionate part of the amount due on the mortgage. But the mortgage does not, by reason of such purchase, of necessity become extinct. This is clear from the provisions of the last paragraph of s. 60 of Act No. IV of 1882, and the rulings cited in his judgment by my brother Knox. That paragraph would be unnecessary and superfluous, if, as is contended on behalf of the appellant, the purchase of a part of the mortgaged property by the mortgagee has the effect of fully discharging the mortgage in every instance. That property may be sold subject to a mortgage and that the mortgagee himself may purchase the mortgagor's equity of redemption in whole or in part, either by private sale or at auction in execution of a decree, can admit of no doubt. If, however, a part of the property comprised in a mortgage is sold subject to the mortgage, and the mortgagee himself buys it, certain equities arise between the mortgagee or his representative in interest on the one hand and the mortgagor or the mortgagor's representative in interest on the other, to which a Court is bound, as a Court administering justice and equity, to give effect. One of those equities is that the mortgagee by purchasing a part of the mortgaged property should not place the mortgagor in a worse position than that in which the mortgagor would have been had any other person purchased the property. Where several properties are mortgaged to secure one debt, such properties are, under s. 82 of Act No. IV of 1882, liable, in the absence of a contract to the contrary, to contribute rateably to the debt, the extent of the liability of each property being proportionate to its value at the date of the mortgage. If the mortgagee himself purchases one of the properties liable to contribute rateably to the mortgage debt, he must bear a rateable share of the debt, and he cannot be allowed to benefit himself and to prejudice the mortgagor or the owner of the [32] remainder of the property by throwing on it the whole burden of the debt and making that property solely responsible for the debt. He must bring into account the value of the property purchased by himself. When property is sold subject to a mortgage, the price which the purchaser pays for it is ordinarily the difference between the market value of the property and the amount due upon the mortgage. If the mortgagee himself be the purchaser, and, as generally happens in such cases, the price paid by him, is not the full market value of the property, he should not be allowed to keep in his pocket the difference between the market value and the price paid by him and thereby damnify the mortgagor or other owner of the remainder of the mortgaged property. That is the reason why the mortgagee must bring into account the value of the property purchased by himself. As a result of his doing so, the mortgage may, in some instances, be found to have been fully discharged by his purchase. But there is no principle of law or equity under which it may be held that the fact of the mortgagee buying, subject to his mortgage, a part of the property comprised in his mortgage, is in itself sufficient to extinguish the mortgage. Suppose the mortgaged property consists of a large zamindari. Surely, it cannot be said that if the mortgagee buys a few acres of land in the zamindari, the whole mortgage will thereby be discharged. It is conceivable that the mortgagee may for special reason, e.g., proximity to property owned by himself, be anxious to purchase a small portion of the mortgaged property, and may therefore pay full value for it, the remainder of the property being sufficient security for the mortgage-debt. If he pays full value for the portion purchased by him, the purchase cannot in any way damnify the mortgagor so as to create an equity in his favour as against the mortgagee. It is true that if a person other than the mortgagee buys a part of the mortgaged property, he can only protect the part which he has purchased from the claim of the mortgagee, by payment of the whole of the mortgage money due, but he would have the right of contribution as against the other properties comprised in the mortgage. There appears to be no [33] reason why, if the mortgagee be the purchaser, he should be in a worse position than any other purchaser. For the above reasons, I am of opinion, that the fact of the mortgagee buying a part of the mortgaged property, does not necessarily extinguish the mortgage. To what lesser extent such a purchase may be held to have discharged the mortgage, is not a question which we are called upon to decide on the reference before us. All I need say on that question is that the answer will depend upon the circumstances of each individual case.

The only reported ruling in which a view contrary to that stated above was adopted is that of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (1). The report is very meagre, but it appears from the record of the case, to which we have referred, that in that case a subsequent mortgagee purchased a part of the property comprised in his mortgage in execution of a decree obtained by another mortgagee upon a prior mortgage. Strangely enough the property sold under the prior mortgage was sold subject to the lien created by the subsequent mortgage. Oldfield and Brodhurst, J.J., held "that if the sale was made subject to the lien which he [subsequent mortgagee] had, his debt must be held as satisfied." The learned Judges referred to no authority or principle of law which supported their view. They did not consider whether the difference between the market value of the property and the price paid for it was equal to the amount of the subsequent mortgage, and they held without any qualification that the fact of the mortgagee buying a part of the mortgaged property subject to his mortgage was enough fully to discharge the mortgage. For the reasons I have stated above I am unable to agree with the opinion of the learned Judges. I notice that in Bisheshar Singh v. Laik Singh (2), one of those learned Judges came to a conclusion inconsistent with the view adopted by him three days afterwards in Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain.

The next case which was referred to on behalf of the appellant was that of Khwaja Bakhsh v. Imaman (3). That was a case [34] in which the whole of the mortgaged property was purchased by the mortgagee in execution of a decree obtained by him upon a subsequent mortgage, after notifying to intending purchasers the prior incumbrance held by him. It was held that the prior mortgage was discharged by the purchase. One of the learned Judges based his opinion on the doctrine of merger, which cannot certainly apply to the case of the purchase by the mortgagee of a part only of the mortgaged property. In such a case there cannot be a complete fusion of all the rights of the mortgagor and the mortgagee in the same person. That ruling, therefore, is no authority for the proposition for which the appellant contends.

In the case of Ballam Das v. Amar Raj (4) the mortgagee appears to have purchased the mortgaged property with the leave of the Court at a sale held in execution of a decree obtained by him upon his prior mortgage. I fail to see how such a purchase could have the effect of extinguishing a subsequent mortgage held by him over the same property.

The opinion I have expressed above is in accord with the ruling in Sumera Kuar v. Bhagwant Singh (1).

I would answer the question referred to us by saying, as I have said above, that the purchase by the mortgagee of a part of the mortgaged property under the circumstances stated in the order of reference, does not necessarily extinguish the mortgage.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur with my learned colleagues in thinking that the case of Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (2), was wrongly decided, and I concur in the judgment of my brother Banerji.

BY THE COURT.—We have no hesitation therefore in holding that the precedent Ahmad Wali v. Bakar Husain (2), must be overruled, and in answering both the questions submitted to us in the negative.

We direct that with this answer the record be returned to the Bench which made the reference.

THIS was a suit to obtain a declaration of the plaintiffs' right to and their possession of certain immoveable property. The plaintiffs alleged that on the 28th of June, 1883, the Settlement Officer had expunged their names from the revenue papers relating to the property in suit and had wrongfully caused the name of the defendant to be entered. They claimed to be in possession, and to have remained in possession all along, notwithstanding the settlement record, and they sued only for a declaratory decree.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Jaunpur) found as a fact that the plaintiffs were not in possession, and dismissed the suit, applying s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, BLAIR and BURKITT, JJ :—This second appeal which has been referred to us for decision raises the important question by what limitation rule is a suit for a declaration of right to and [36] of actual possession in immoveable property governed? The point arises in this way. The plaintiffs, who are respondents before us, allege that they are entitled to possession of and are in possession of certain property in mauza Bataura. They say that by an order dated the 28th of June, 1883, the Settlement Officer, who was then conducting settlement proceedings in the Jaunpur district, on the application of the defendant, expunged their names from the village papers in respect of the property in dispute and recorded the name of the defendant as being in possession. They further allege that they were, at the time the Settlement Officer made this entry, in possession, and that they have been in actual possession ever since up to the date of the suit, namely, the 15th of May, 1895. Now, when twelve years have almost elapsed since the day when the Settlement Officer made the entry in the village papers of which they complain, and which they set forth as their cause of action, they come forward with this suit, in which they ask for a declaration both of right and of actual possession at the date of the suit in respect of the property in suit. The contention raised before us is that their suit was barred at the time they instituted it. The appellant bases his contention upon this, that there is no article in sch. II of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877 which would apply to the suit as brought, and that therefore it must fall within the purview of art. 120, an article which provides only six years within which to bring the suit from the date of the cause of action. If this contention is right, the suit is undoubtedly barred. The respondents seek, on the other hand, to bring the suit, though expressly described as a suit for a declaration of right to and of possession in immoveable property, under art. 144, which provides for suits for possession of immoveable property or of any interest therein. It seems to us that there is the widest possible difference between a suit for a declaration such as is asked for in this suit and a suit for actual possession of immoveable property. In a suit to which art. 144 would apply, there must be a prayer, express or implied for the dispossession of some one from the property or from the interest in it which the suit claims. In the present suit [37] the plaintiffs have most distinctly asserted that they are and have all along been in possession of the property. There is no one to be dispossessed from it or from any interest in it. All that they want removed is a cloud, which they say was cast upon their title almost twelve years before the institution of the suit. We ought to notice that before this contention was laid before us it was contended by the learned vakil for the respondents that this was a suit to which, to use his own words, no limitation applies. He cited in aid s. 23 of the Limitation Act, and contended that this was a case of a continuing wrong, that as long as what he contended to be the wrong entry in the village papers continued on record, so long a fresh cause of action accrued every day. In the first place, this is not the allegation in the plaint, which sets forth a distinct cause of action as having accrued and become complete on the 28th of June 1883. Secondly, the act of the Settlement Officer, if it was a wrong to the plaintiffs was a wrong committed once for all, and was very properly described as being the cause of action upon which the plaintiffs came into court.

With regard to the contention that the suit fell within art. 144, the learned vakil cited as the leading case in his favour Moru Bin Patlaji v. Gopal Bin Satu (1). That case, if we may so put it, was a very frail reed on which to rest so heavy a contention. The two judges who were first seised of the case differed in opinion. One of them, it is true, appeared to be in favour of the view now urged upon our notice by the respondents. The judges being divided in opinion, the plaintiff in that suit preferred an appeal under the Letters Patent, and thereupon it was held that the question of limitation was not one which could properly be raised in the suit. Another case which certainly does favour the respondents' contention is that of Debi Prasad v. Jafar Ali (2). We cannot concur in the remarks of Mr. Justice Oldfield in that case, which are set out on page 45. The learned judge himself must soon have felt considerable doubt as to the view he took in that case, for [38] we find him in Durga v. Haudar Ali (3) expressly holding that claims declaratory in their nature were governed by art. 120 of the Indian Limitation Act of 1877. To the same effect is the case of Bhikaji Baji v. Pandu (4) which was brought to our notice by the learned counsel for the appellant. The same learned counsel drew our attention to what the Privy Council had held in Mahomed Riasat Ali v. Hasin Banu (5). At page 163 their Lordships discuss the limitation applicable to such a suit, and say that art. 120 should be applied unless it is clear that the suit is within some other article. We can find no such article, and no such article has been pointed out to us. We hold that the suit when instituted was barred by limitation and could not be maintained. We therefore allow this appeal, set aside the judgment and decree of the Court below and direct that the suit stand dismissed.

As regards costs, we think that, as the point was not raised in any of the Courts below, we should make no order, and we make none.

Appeal decreed.

ORDER.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This is an application under s. 372 of the Code of Civil Procedure, read with s. 582 of that Code, to be added as a respondent to an appeal [39] pending in this Court. The applicant is a judgment-creditor of the respondent, and he caused the decree appealed against to be attached in execution of a decree held by him against the respondent. It is contended on his behalf that by reason of this attachment he has acquired an interest pending the suit and is therefore entitled to be joined as a party to the appeal under s. 372. In our opinion the applicant is not a person in whose favour there has been an assignment, creation or devolution of any interest pending the appeal. It is conceded that he is not an assignee of the decree. What Mr. Madho Prasad urges on his behalf is that an interest has been created in favour of the applicant by operation of law, that is, by the attachment which he has obtained over the decree held by the respondent. With this contention we are unable to agree. As stated on page 264 of Daniell's Chancery Practice, Vol. I.—“It is a general rule that no one should be made a party to an action against whom, if brought to a hearing, no order can be made.” The test therefore is whether the applicant is a person in whose favour or against whom a decree can be made in the appeal. We think that he is not such a person. Mr. Madho Prasad relied upon the case of Wallis v. Smith (1). That case in our opinion has no bearing upon the present question. That was a case in which, after decree had been obtained, the decree-holder, plaintiff, took out a garnishee order against one of the debtors of his judgment-debtor. The London and South Western Bank, which held a decree against the decree-holder plaintiff, and which had got the plaintiff's decree attached, applied to be made a party to the proceedings taken out by the plaintiff against his judgment-debtor, and that application was granted. A case like that is provided for by section 273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, according to which a judgment-creditor who has caused a decree to be attached may under certain circumstances himself apply for the execution of that decree and may take all the steps necessary to realise the amount of the decree attached by him. That is a very different [40] thing from holding that an attaching creditor has a right to be heard as to the merits of the decree attached by him which is sub judice in appeal. For the above reasons we refuse the application with costs.

Application refused.

Criminal Procedure Code, ss. 337 and 529—Pardon—Tender of pardon by a Magistrate having powers under s. 337, but not being the Magistrate before whom inquiry was being held.

A dacoity was committed in the district of Muttra and was being inquired into in that district. Pending such inquiry, one Partap Singh appeared before the Magistrate of the neighbouring district of Etah and obtained from him a tender of pardon in respect of the said dacoity, on the strength of which pardon he was examined as a witness by the Magistrate of the Etah district and made a statement implicating himself and others in the dacoity. Subsequently, on the case being committed to the Court of the Sessions Judge of Agra, the tender of pardon made by the District Magistrate of Etah was ignored and Partap Singh was tried and sentenced for the dacoity.

Held, on appeal to the High Court, that the Magistrate of Etah District had no jurisdiction under the circumstances to make the tender of pardon which he did, and that his action in that respect was not covered by s. 529 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—Chidda, Kallu, Kana, Partap Singh, Sona and Tunya have been convicted of an offence under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code and have one and all been sentenced to transportation for life. They have all appealed, and their appeals are now before us for decision. One of them, Partab Singh, pleaded guilty in the Court of Session, but in that Court he also pleaded in bar of sentence the fact that he had obtained what he considered a pardon under s. 337 of the Code of [41] Criminal Procedure from the District Magistrate of Etah. In his memorandum of appeal here he pleads the same fact in bar of sentence. We will deal with his case first. The dacoity with which he is charged took place in the district of Muttra. The only inquiry connected with it that we know of was conducted from first to last in the district of Muttra. After that inquiry had continued for a considerable time in the district of Muttra; after one Balwanta had been arrested and obtained an offer of pardon from the District Magistrate of Muttra, and had named certain persons, and among them this very Partab Singh, who is himself a resident of Muttra, as having taken part in the dacoity, Partab Singh betook himself to the District of Etah, there presented himself before the District Magistrate, and, by some representations, of which we know nothing, obtained a tender of pardon from that Magistrate. The District Magistrate of Etah was not the District Magistrate before whom the offence of the dacoity was under inquiry, and he was certainly not one of the other persons mentioned in s. 337 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. This being the case, he had no jurisdiction to tender a pardon to Partap Singh. Partap Singh was, however, examined as a witness by the Magistrate of Etah, and it is contended from the fact that he was so examined under a tender of pardon, however wrongly granted, that that tender of pardon, cannot now be set aside. The last clause of s. 529 is cited in support of this contention. In our opinion s. 529 refers to quite different circumstances. It is a section which deals with acts done by a Magistrate in no way empowered by law to do those acts; it has no reference to a Magistrate empowered otherwise under the Act to tender pardon, but not possessing jurisdiction over the particular offence. The Magistrate of Etah, as Magistrate of the district Etah, is undoubtedly empowered to tender pardon in respect of offences inquired into in the Etah district which are covered by the provisions of s. 337 of the Code of Criminal Procedure: but he has no such jurisdiction in respect of an offence of the same kind committed in the district of Muttra. On the other [42] hand a second or third class Magistrate in the Muttra district not inquiring into the offence or not empowered by the Magistrate of the district, has no power by law to tender a pardon to a person accused of having committed an offence covered by s. 337 within the district of Muttra, but if such a Magistrate should tender a pardon in such a case, his proceedings would not be set aside merely on the ground of his not being so empowered. Under these circumstances the Court of Session was, in our opinion, right in ignoring the pardon tendered by the District Magistrate of Etah to Partap Singh, and the so-called pardon cannot be pleaded in bar of sentence. The appeal of Partap Singh is, therefore, dismissed.

* Criminal Appeal, No. 584 of 1897.

[The remainder of the judgment being occupied chiefly with a discussion of the facts of the case, is not reported.—ED.]

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BLAIR, J.:—In 1869 Jit Singh, who was possessed of a 12-biswa share in the village of Sitalpur, died. He left a son, Sewa, and a widow, Raika. Sewa and Raika obtained mutation of names in the Revenue papers each in respect of six biswas out of the twelve biswas. In 1873 Sewa died and left a widow, Musammat Pan Kunwar. He left no son. Musammat Pan Kunwar got mutation in her favour in the Revenue papers of the six biswas which had been entered in Sewa's name. Disputes began between Pan Kunwar and Raika after Sewa's death. They commenced to live separately. Each collected in respect of an 8-anna share of the 16 annas of the original 12 biswas, and in 1880 these ladies partitioned the 12 biswas between them. The Court of first instance found that Raika's possession was adverse from the first, that is, from the death of Jit Singh. The Court of first appeal found that Raika's possession of the 6 bis was did not become adverse until the death of Sewa. There was evidence to support the latter finding. After the partition in 1880, Raika mortgaged the 6 biswas of which she was in possession to Puran Lal, who was the father of the defendants in this suit, who are appellants here. Puran Lal subsequently brought a suit for sale under the Transfer of Property Act on his mortgage, got a decree for sale, and on the 20th of October 1887, at the sale under that decree, purchased the 6 biswas which had been in the possession of Raika. In 1888 Raika died. On the 22nd of December 1893 Musammat Pan Kunwar died. After her death the defendants 3, 4 and 5 in this suit, who were reversioners of Sewa, sold all their rights, whatever they were, in the 12 biswas, to the plaintiff. In December 1895 the plaintiff brought his suit against the representatives of Puran Lal to obtain possession of the 6 biswas which had been held by Musammat Raika. The suit was dismissed in the first Court on the finding that Raika had had adverse [44] possession since 1869. The Court of first appeal, holding that her adverse possession did not commence until 1873, and applying the Full Bench ruling of this Court in Ram Kali v. Kedarnath (1) set aside the decision of the first Court and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order this appeal has been brought by the defendants-appellants.

Their contention is that the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mussummat Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh (2) impliedly overruled the decision in Ram Kali v. Kedarnath (1) and that on the finding of Raika's possession being adverse from the death of Sewa in 1873, the Court of first appeal was bound to dismiss the appeal to that Court and affirm the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit, and had no power to make an order of remand.

On the other hand, it is contended for the respondents that their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case to which we have referred did not overrule the Full Bench decision of this Court in Ram Kali v. Kedarnath (1); that that decision applied, and, as there had been no suit by or against Mussammât Pan Kunwar in which Raika's adverse possession had been established or Raika's adverse claim had been made, art. 141 of sch. II of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, applied, and limitation commenced to run, not from 1873, but from the death of Mussammât Pan Kunwar in 1893, when the succession opened up to the defendants 3, 4 and 5. It was further contended on behalf of the respondent that the finding of the Court of first appeal that the possession of Raika became adverse on the death of Sewa in 1873, was a bad finding in law, it being alleged that there was no evidence in support of it.

This is an appeal from an order of remand made by a Court of first appeal. The findings of fact of that Court of first appeal [45] are therefore in our opinion binding on us, unless they are contrary to law, if partly of law and partly of fact, or unless there was no evidence to support them. We agree with the decision in Gauri Shankar v. Karima Bibi (1). This question of the legality of the order of remand could be raised, as it was here, by an appeal under s. 588 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It was open, according to the rulings of this Court, the propriety of which we need not discuss, as they are binding on us, to these appellants to have refrained from bringing an appeal against the order and to have raised the question of the legality or propriety of that order in an appeal against the decree which might ultimately be made by the Court of first appeal. That is the construction which has been put by this Court upon s. 591 of Act No. XIV of 1882. In second appeal, we are bound by the findings of fact of the Court of first appeal. We cannot question them, unless they are based upon a misconception of the law or have no evidence to support them. It would be an anomaly if, in an appeal from an order in the same suit of the Court of first appeal, we could do that which we could not do in an appeal from a decree of the Court in that suit, namely, question the findings of fact of the Court of first appeal, except upon one of the grounds to which we have alluded. We find that there is evidence on the record which shows that, at least from the death of Sewa in 1873, Mussammât Raika took up an independent position and claimed the profits of the 6-biswa share entered in her name and obtained them for her own use. As the widow of Jit Singh, she had absolutely no title to the 6-biswa share or any part of it. Her only interest, so to speak, during the lifetime of her son, and on his death during the lifetime of his widow, was a right to be maintained. Consequently, it not having been found, and there being no evidence, that she was allowed possession for maintenance, the Court below rightly found that, at least from 1873, Raika's possession was adverse. In truth, the plaintiff had not set up that Raika had permissive possession, possession by courtesy, or possession in lieu of maintenance. The plaintiff came [46] into Court on the simple case, which was entirely disproved, that Raika never was in possession at all.

Now, on the findings of the Court of first appeal, if the Full Bench decision in Ram Kali v. Kedarnath was right, the order of the lower Court was right. If that decision has been impliedly overruled by the decision of the Privy Council to which we have referred, the defendants were entitled to move the Court of first appeal to dismiss the appeal to that Court. The Full Bench decision in Ram Kali v. Kedarnath was based on a Full Bench decision of the Calcutta Court in Srinath Kur v. Prosunno Kumar Ghosh (2). It appears to us that their Lordships of the Privy Council in the case of Lachhan Kunwar v. Anant Singh, to which we have referred, have impliedly overruled the Full Bench decision of this Court, and that article 141 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877 does not apply where a trespasser has held, as against the widow of a sonless and separated Hindu, adverse possession, and that adverse possession must in such a case be counted, for the purposes of limitation, from the time when such trespasser or other person first began to hold adversely to the widow. In our opinion the law on this point and on article 141 is explained clearly by our brother Burkitt in Hanuman Prasad Singh v. Bhagauti Prasad (1). We allow this appeal with costs, and, setting aside the order under appeal, we dismiss the appeal to the Court of first appeal with costs, and restore and affirm the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit with costs.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J. (KNOX, J., concurring).—The suit out of which this first appeal has arisen was instituted by the Collector of Moradabad (under instructions from the Local Government) under the provisions of s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The case for the plaintiff is that one Miran Shah, the ancestor of all the defendants, had, before his death some fifty years before suit, made a waqf of mauza Haibatpur for religious and charitable purposes, for the up-keep of a mosque and imambara he had founded, for the expenses of an annual "urs" or religious assembly to commemorate the Pir Ghaus Azam, to feed the poor at the "urs" and to keep his (Miran Shah's) tomb in repair. It is admitted that mauza Haibatpur had been granted revenue-free to Miran Shah, who was a man of great piety and sanctity among Mussalmans; that the revenue-free grant was made by the Oudh Government, and that the village still remains muafi, not having been resumed at either of the two settlements which have taken place since the British Government came into possession. It was alleged for the plaintiff that the village came into the possession [48] of Miran Shah's heirs as trustees, and that they for a considerable time performed properly their duty as such; but latterly (having become Shiah) they have, in breach of the trust, treated the trust property as their own, have mortgaged and otherwise alienated some portions of it, and have pulled down some of the trust buildings and appropriated to their own use the value of the materials. The plaintiff accordingly prayed for the appointment of new trustees—which of course implies the dismissal of the existing trustees; that the property be declared to be wakf, and the defendants be required to furnish accounts and to pay sums which they had improperly appropriated in breach of the trust. It was also prayed that a scheme for the management of the trust should be settled.

Those of the defendants who appeared first of all raised a plea of limitation to the effect that they had been dealing with the property as their own for more than twelve years. There does not seem to have been any discussion as to this plea at the hearing. Clearly, once the trust was established, such a plea could not prevail. They next pleaded want of parties, that their transferees should have been made parties. This plea was overruled by the lower Court. In the fourth paragraph of the written statement, the defendants deny the fact of the endowment, alleging that "the property in dispute was never endowed for charitable purposes as alleged by the plaintiff on behalf of any party, i.e., for the purposes set forth in the plaint." This paragraph, while denying the plaintiff's case as to the trust, may perhaps be regarded as an admission that the objects of the alleged waqf as set forth in the plaint are charitable purposes. In subsequent paragraphs, the defendants deny that the income of the property in dispute was ever applied to the purposes mentioned in the plaint. They also deny the demolition of an imambara in Haibatpur and of an ancestral house in Sambhal. The first portion of this plea—like the first paragraph of the written statement—takes advantage of a blunder in the plaint, afterwards amended. The imambara, mosque, &c., were not in [49] Haibatpur, but in an adjoining mohalla of the town of Sambhal. There is nothing in the plaint about an ancestral house. The seventh paragraph of the written statement is important. In that paragraph the defendants admit that the property in dispute descended to them from Miran Shah, and they add that they spend money on the mosque, imambara and tomb according to their respective positions, a statement which at the hearing of this appeal was explained to mean that they were not legally bound to spend any money on such purposes, but did so of their own free will and pleasure. These are the only pleas which call for notice.

The District Judge gave the plaintiff a decree. The defendants appeal.

The first plea argued for them was that the suit was bad because the transferees from the defendants had not been impleaded. That plea was overruled, and we think rightly, by the learned District Judge. In support of this contention the learned advocate for the appellants cited the case of Bishen Chand v. Syed Nadir (1), in which, at p. 9, their Lordships found themselves unable, in a suit in which all the parties interested were not before them, to decide the extent of certain trusts, and whether any surplus remained over to the mutawalli for his private use. We cannot see that this case is any authority for the proposition that to a suit for the execution and administration of a trust the alienees of the trust property, who have an interest adverse to the trust are necessary parties. In the case of Chintaman Bajaji Dev v. Dhondo Ganesh Dev (2) which was a suit under section 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the execution and administration of a trust and for removal of the trustees, who had incumbered and alienated a large portion of the trust property, the incumbrancers and alienees were not considered necessary parties. And in the case of The Attorney General v. The Port Reeve and others of Avon (3), it was held by the [50] Lords Justices that persons claiming title adverse to a trust cannot be made parties to a suit for the execution of the trust. No case has been shown to us in which, in a suit under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the alienees or incumbrancers have been made parties, and indeed it does not appear what relief could be granted against them under that section. We think that a prayer for recovery of possession from such persons could not be entertained under that section. The plaintiff in this suit could not institute a suit for possession. Such a suit could be instituted only by the trustee. We therefore overrule this plea.

Next it is contended that the waqf set up by the plaint is bad, as it is not for public religious or charitable purposes. The briefest consideration of the purposes of the waqf set out above is in our opinion abundantly sufficient to show that they are public charitable and religious purposes. That plea also fails.

The last plea of law raised by the appellants is that the suit is bad because a suit to remove a trustee cannot be entertained under s. 539 of the Code. As far as we can ascertain the first doubt whether such a suit would lie was suggested by an obiter dictum in the case of Narasimha v. Ayyan Chetti (4), where the learned Judges are reported to have said that "it is not at all clear that a suit to remove a trustee can be maintained under s. 539." The question was not decided in the next case, Sathappayar v. Periasami (5), as it was held that that case did not come under s. 539, the object of the endowment being for private religious purposes, namely to perpetuate the spiritual family of a guru. But in the case of Subbayya v. Krishna (6) the question was very elaborately argued before a Bench of three Judges, and it was held by a majority of the Court that a suit to remove a trustee could be maintained under s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The same question again came before the Madras High Court in Rangasami Naickan [51] v. Varadappa Naickan (7), when a Bench of three Judges (one of whom was the dissentient Judge in the case of Subbayya v. Krishna just mentioned) held that a suit to remove a trustee could not be maintained under s. 539 of the Code. In Chintaman Bajaji Dev v. Dhondo Ganesh Dev (2), a case already cited, the question was not raised.

(5) 14 M. 1.

(3) 33 L. J. N. S. Ch. 172.
(6) 14 M. 186.

It appears to have been taken for granted that such a suit could be maintained. In the case Tricumdass Mulji v. Khimji Vullabhdas (1), which was a suit to administer a public charitable trust, to compel a trustee to account, and for the removal from office of that trustee and for the appointment of a new trustee, it was held, following the decision of the majority of the Bench in Subbayya v. Krishna (2), that the suit came under s. 539, and could not be maintained, as the sanction of the Advocate-General had not been obtained. The most recent case in the Bombay Court is that of Sayad Hussein Mian v. The Collector of Kaira (3), and in it the decision in the previous case following the ruling of the majority of the Judges in Subbayya v. Krishna was affirmed. There are also two cases in the 20th volume of the Indian Law Reports, Calcutta Series, namely, Sajedur Raja v. Baidyanath Deb at p. 397 and Mohiuddin v. Sayiduddin at p. 810, the rule laid down in which is to the same effect as in the Bombay cases and in Subbayya v. Krishna (2). The case of Sajedur Raja Chowdhuri v. Gour Mohun Das Baishnav (4), the report of which was published after we had reserved judgment in this appeal, follows and approves of the decision of the majority of the Bench in Subbayya v. Krishna (2).

In this conflict of authority there is undoubtedly a preponderance of judicial decisions in favour of the proposition that a suit to have a trustee removed and another appointed in his place is a suit which is covered by the provisions of s. 539 of the Code of Civil Procedure. We have considered and studied the elaborate judgments of the Madras High Court in the cases in [52] the 14th and 17th volumes of the Madras Reports. After mature consideration our opinion is in conformity with that expressed by the majority of the Bench in Subbayya v. Krishna (2). We entirely concur in the elaborate judgment of Mr. Justice Weir and in the reasons he gives for the conclusion at which he arrived. We feel we can add nothing to it. We hold therefore that this suit is not bad because of the prayer for the removal of the existing trustees.

On the merits we are of opinion that the appellants have failed to make out their case. That mauza Haibatpur was granted free of revenue to Miran Shah, though a Sunni, by the Shiah Government of Oudh, on account of his character for holiness and sanctity is not denied. It is also admitted that the British Government has continued the muafi to Miran Shah's family up to the present day. The exhibits Record Nos. 18C and 19C show the reason why Government at the last settlement, instead of resuming the muafi grant (as it might have done), allowed it to continue. The first paragraph of the wajib-ul-arz No. 18C shows the reason for the continuance of the muafi to be because mauza Haibatpur is a mahal "appropriated to charitable expenses in connection with a mosque, imambara and 'urs' of Ghaus Azam." And the same reasons for the continuance of the muafi are given in Record No. 19C drawn up some three years later. We think these facts are most significant and important. It is admitted that Miran Shah left no son living at his death and that he was succeeded by his daughters (three in number), whose descendants are now in possession of Haibatpur. Why should the grant have been continued to them revenue free, unless because of Miran Shah having dedicated Haibatpur to charitable and religious purposes? It is not even suggested that these descendants of Miran Shah in the female line had any personal claims to receive a revenue-free grant at the hands of the British Government, nor is it suggested that, either at the settlement of 1846 or at the subsequent [53] settlement of about 1874-75, any such personal claims were put forward. Clearly the muafi was continued at settlement because of the reasons stated in Record Nos. 18C and 19C. Here we would refer to the attested copy (Record No. 74C.) of a deposition by Sayyed Hasan, a pleader who appeared for Musammât Husenî Begam (one of the appellants here), in a partition case, in which it was sought to have mauza Haibatpur partitioned among the descendants of Miran Shah in 1889. The pleader in that deposition on behalf of his client, the defendant-appellant Musammât Husenî Begam, in the clearest terms declared mauza Haibatpur to be endowed property, the income of which was applied to the mosque, the imambara and the "urs," and that it was so applied by his client as mutawalli jointly with the other mutawallis. To the same effect is a petition, No. 75C of the record, filed in the same partition proceedings by Musammât Muhamdi, one of the defendants to this suit, now deceased. The genuineness of the petition is proved by the evidence of Muhammad Husen, son of Musammât Muhamdi. This petition is much to the same effect as the deposition just mentioned above. It states that mauza Haibatpur is endowed property, and that it was granted muafi in 1840 to Miran Shah for charitable purposes. No. 76C of the record is an attested copy of another deposition made by the pleader Sayyed Hasan in July 1889, on behalf of Musammât Husenî Begam in the partition case. This deposition emphasizes the pleader's former statement, and further makes mention of papers relating to the settlement of 1846, copies of which papers the witness produced to the official making the partition. The appellants have not attempted to produce any of the papers just mentioned, though, as they were produced by Musammât Husenî's pleader in 1889, it may be presumed she has possession of them now. There are further on record two petitions, Nos. 78C and 79C, dated the 21st of January and 24th of February 1890, filed by Sayyed Asghar Hasan (one of the defendants-appellants) before the revenue authorities in mutation of names proceedings, in both of which he asserts that [54] mauza Haibatpur is an endowed village, the revenue of which is devoted to the mosque, imambara, urs of Ghaus Azam and support of the mutawallis. In No. 78C it is alleged that the wajibularz (record No. 18C) was prepared as proof of those facts. The documentary evidence detailed above establishes in our opinion a very strong case in favour of the plaintiff respondent.

The defendants appellants did not produce any documentary evidence. They have contended themselves with calling four witnesses, three of whom are worthless, while the deposition of the fourth, Intizam Ali, is more favourable to the respondent's case than to the appellants'.

The respondent has called three witnesses, Kazi Imam Ali, Sheikh Wilayat Ali and Masiat-ullah, all of whom were acquainted with Miran Shah. Their evidence most strongly supports the respondent's case, showing as it does that Miran Shah himself built the mosque and imambara and expressed his intention of dedicating the income of Haibatpur to their support. One of the witnesses professes to know of, and to have been present at, the execution of the waqf by Miran Shah. Two of them also speak of how the descendants of Miran Shah have now discontinued the charities and demolished the buildings.

Having now discussed all the material evidence in the case, it appears to us that there is a great mass of evidence in favour of the plaintiff which the appellants have in no way attempted to rebut. We have no hesitation in finding, concurring therein with the Court below, that Miran Shah did before his death dedicate mauza Haibatpur as a waqf for the religious and charitable institutions mentioned in the plaint, which he had established, the mosque, the imambara, the "urs" of Ghaus Azam, &c. We find that mauza Haibatpur devolved on the daughters of Miran Shah and on their descendants in trust for the performance of the religious and charitable purposes to which Miran Shah had dedicated the village. We concur with the lower Court in holding that the plaintiff is entitled to the declaration he has obtained as [55] to mauza Haibatpur being waqf property, and in the finding that the defendants are in possession as trustees of the waqf and have no proprietary rights in Haibatpur. We find that the trustees have grossly violated their duties as such, that they have failed to apply any portion of the income of the village to the purposes of the trust, that they have appropriated the income to their own private purposes and that they have dilapidated and dismantled the buildings constructed by Miran Shah, and have put into their own pockets the value of the materials of the imambara. We further find that they have wrongfully alienated portions of the endowed property and that they have denied that they are trustees and claim to be proprietors of Haibatpur in their own right. Such trustees should not in our opinion be permitted to remain any longer in possession of the trust property. We therefore direct their removal and that possession of the trust property be transferred to the mutawalli who has been nominated by the learned District Judge. We may add that, as no observations were addressed to us on either side either for or against the scheme for the administration of the trust prepared by the District Judge, we refrain from making any remarks as to it. The only questions argued before us are those which we have discussed in this judgment. We dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Act No. XLV of 1860 (Indian Penal Code), s. 124A — Exciting disaffection — Meaning of term "disaffection" explained.

Any one who, by any of the means referred to in s. 124-A of the Indian Penal Code, excites, or attempts to excite, feelings of hatred, dislike, ill-will, enmity or hostility towards the Government established by law in British India, excites or attempts to excite, as the case may be, feelings of "disaffection" as that term is used in s. 124-A. Such feelings are necessarily inconsistent [56] with and incompatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of Government and to support that Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist it. The term "disaffection" may be taken as synonymous with "disloyalty." The ordinary meaning of the term "disaffection" as used in s. 124-A is not varied by the explanation appended to that section.

or other occasions. Where it is ascertained that the intention of such person was to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, it is immaterial whether or not the words spoken, written or published could have the effect of exciting such feelings of disaffection, and it is immaterial whether the words were true or were false, and, except on the question of punishment, or in a case in which the speaker, writer or publisher is charged with having excited such feelings of disaffection, it is immaterial whether or not the words did in fact excite such feelings of disaffection. *Queen-Empress v. THE facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.
Mr. Roshan Lal, for the appellant.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

The judgment of the Court (EDGE, C.J., BLAIR and BURKITT, JJ.) was delivered by EDGE, C.J. :—

JUDGMENT.

Amba Prasad was committed by the Magistrate of Moradabad to the Court of Session of Moradabad for trial on a charge that on or about the 14th of July 1897, he did attempt to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India by publishing in a newspaper called the Jami-ul-ulam, of which he was proprietor, editor and publisher, an article entitled "Azadi band hone se kabal namuna" and had thereby committed an offence punishable under s. 124-A of the Indian Penal Code and within the cognizance of the Court of Session. In his examination before the Magistrate of Moradabad under s. 364 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, [57] Amba Prasad stated that he had published the issues of the Jami-ul-ulam, dated respectively 21st March 1897, 7th April 1897, 21st April 1897, 7th May 1897, 14th July 1897, 21st July 1897 and 28th July 1897. The article on the publication of which the charge was founded was contained in the issue of the newspaper of the 14th of July 1897.

In the Court of Session of Moradabad, Amba Prasad stated that his father's name was Gobind Prasad, a Kayesth, and that he, Amba Prasad, lived in Moradabad, and was 35-36 years of age. Upon the charge being read to him Amba Prasad pleaded guilty. Upon being asked:—"Do you wish to give any reasons as to why you should not be punished for this offence?"—Amba Prasad replied:—"I can give no reason. Through inexperience I have committed this fault, for which I am very ashamed, and I wish to throw myself unconditionally upon the mercy of the Government. This is all I wish to say." The Court of Session accordingly found Amba Prasad guilty of the offence of which he had pleaded guilty, and under s. 124-A of the Indian Penal Code sentenced him therefor to eighteen months' rigorous imprisonment. From that sentence Amba Prasad has appealed to this Court. In the petition of appeal the grounds of appeal are stated as follows :—

1. "That the prisoner appellant having pleaded guilty, having tendered an unqualified apology for the offence with which he was charged, and having thrown himself entirely upon the mercy of the Court, the sentence of 18 months' rigorous imprisonment passed upon him by the learned Sessions Judge is too severe.

2. That the judgment of the lower Court nowhere discloses the fact that the article upon which the prisoner appellant has been convicted was of such a serious character as to make its writer liable to a very heavy punishment.

3. That the lower Court, in holding that a term of 18 months' rigorous imprisonment was in the case of the appellant a mild sentence upon the authority of the case of Queen-Empress v. [58] Tilak, has failed to take into account the differentiating circumstances which make the appellant's offence very much less serious and therefore deserving of a much lighter sentence.

4. That there is nothing on record which, after the appellant's plea and apology, would make him liable to anything more than a nominal punishment.

5. That upon the foregoing grounds the prisoner appellant prays for mitigation of the sentence passed upon him by the lower Court."

In order to determine whether or not this appeal should be allowed, and, if allowed, to what extent, it is necessary to consider s. 124 A of the Indian Penal Code and to arrive at a conclusion as to the degree of culpability in Amba Prasad to be fairly and reasonably inferred from his acts. The section is as follows:—

"124-A. Whoever by words, either spoken or intended to be read, or by signs, or by visible representation or otherwise, excites, or attempts to excite, feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, shall be punished with transportation for life or for any term, to which fine may be added, or with imprisonment for a term which may extend to three years, to which fine may be added, or with fine.

Explanation.—Such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority, is not disaffection. Therefore, the making of comments on the measures of the Government, with the intention of exciting only this species of disapprobation, is not an offence within this clause."

That section has been under judicial consideration by Sir Comer Petheram in the Queen-Empress v. Jogendra Chunder Bose (1); by Mr. Justice Strachey on the trial of Bal Gangadhar Tilak in the Bombay High Court; by a Full Bench of the [59] Bombay High Court, consisting of Sir Charles Farran, C. J., Mr. Justice Candy and Mr. Justice Strachey, on the application of Bal Gangadhar Tilak for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council; by a Board of the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Hobhouse, Lord Davey and Sir Richard Couch, on the application of Bal Gangadhar Tilak for special leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council; and by Sir Charles Farran, C. J., Mr. Justice Parsons and Mr. Justice Ranade in the appeal of Ram Chandra Narayan and Kishnaji Dhondu from the order of conviction and sentence of the Sessions Judge of Satara in their case.

If there be any difficulty as to the true meaning of s. 124-A of the Indian Penal Code it is caused by the Explanation which forms part of that section. In the Queen-Empress v. Jogendra Chunder Bose (1) it was contended by the counsel for the accused persons that "disaffection" and "disapprobation" were synonymous words and had one and the same meaning. On that contention it was observed by Sir Comer Petheram, and in our opinion correctly, having regard to the question before him:—"If that reasoning were sound, it would be impossible for any person to be convicted under the section, as every class of writing would be within the explanation." Sir Comer Petheram thus defined "disaffection" and "disapprobation" as those words are used in s. 124-A:—"Disaffection means a feeling contrary to affection, in other words, dislike or hatred. Disapprobation means simply disapproval. It is quite possible to disapprove of a man's sentiments or action and yet to like him. The meaning of the two words is so distinct that I feel it hardly necessary to tell you that the contention of Mr. Jackson cannot be sustained. If a person uses either spoken or written words calculated to create in the minds of the persons to whom they are addressed a disposition not to obey the lawful authority of the Government, or to subvert or resist that authority, if and when occasion should arise, and if he does so with the intention [60] of creating such a disposition in his hearers, he will be guilty of the offence of attempting to excite disaffection within the meaning of the section, though no disturbance is brought about by his words or any feeling of disaffection, in fact, produced by them. It is sufficient for the purposes of the section that the words used are calculated to excite feelings of ill-will against the Government and to hold it up to the hatred and contempt of the people and that they were used with the intention to create such feeling."

The charge which was before the jury in Queen-Empress v. Jogendra Chunder Bose was that the accused had attempted to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, and was not that they had in fact excited feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India: and it is in relation to that charge which was before the jury that Sir Comer Petheram's direction to the jury must be read. Later on in his direction to the jury Sir Comer Petheram, in referring to the articles in respect of the publication of which the charges under s. 124-A arose, said:—"Were those articles intended to excite feelings of enmity against the Government, or, on the other hand, were they merely expressing, though in strong language, disapprobation of certain Government measures? You will bear in mind that the question you have to decide has reference to the intention, and, in fact, the crime consists of the intention, for a man might lawfully do the act without the intention. The evidence of the intent can only be gathered from the articles. The ultimate object of the writer may be one thing, but if, in attaining that object, he uses, as the means, the exciting of disaffection against the Government, then he would be guilty under section 124-A. If you think that these people, with the object of procuring the repeal of the Age of Consent Act, or of increasing the sale of their paper, disseminated these articles, intending to excite feelings of enmity, you will be bound to find a verdict of guilty."

Mr. Justice Strachey in his direction to the Jury in Queen-Empress v. Bal Gangadhar Tilak, in explaining section 124-A [61] in reference to the charges in that case before the jury, said:—"I agree with Sir Comer Petheram in the Bangobasi case, that disaffection means simply the absence of affection." If that sentence had stood alone and was not explained by what followed, it would no doubt have constituted a misdirection. "Disaffection" necessarily implies an absence of affection, but a mere absence of affection is not "disaffection" within the meaning of section 124-A. Mr. Justice Strachey in that part of his direction which immediately follows the sentence which we have quoted made it perfectly plain what in his opinion "disaffection," within the meaning of section 124-A, is. He said :—

"It means hatred, enmity, dislike, hostility, contempt and every form of ill-will to the Government. 'Disloyalty' is perhaps the best general term, comprehending every possible form of bad feeling to the Government. That is what the law means by the disaffection which a man must not excite or attempt to excite : he must not make or try to make others feel enmity of any kind towards the Government. You will observe that the amount or intensity of the disaffection is absolutely immaterial, except perhaps in dealing with the question of punishment : if a man excites or attempts to excite feelings of disaffection, great or small, he is guilty under the section. In the next place it is absolutely immaterial whether any feelings of disaffection have been excited or not by the publication in question. It is true that there is before you a charge against each prisoner that he has actually excited feelings of disaffection to the Government. If you are satisfied that he has done so, you will of course find him guilty. But if you should hold that that charge is not made out and that no one is proved to have been excited to entertain feelings of disaffection to the Government by reading these articles, still that alone would not justify you in acquitting the prisoners. For each of them is charged not only with exciting feelings of disaffection, but also with attempting to excite such feelings. You will observe that the section places absolutely on the same footing the successful exciting of feelings of disaffection and the unsuccessful attempt to excite [62] them ; so that if you find that either of the prisoners has tried to excite such feelings in others, you must convict him, even if there is nothing to show that he succeeded.

"Again it is important that you should fully realize another point. The offence consists in exciting or attempting to excite in others certain bad feelings towards the Government. It is not the exciting or attempting to excite mutiny or rebellion, or any sort of actual disturbance, great or small. Whether any disturbance or outbreak was caused by these articles is absolutely immaterial. If the accused intended by the articles to excite rebellion or disturbance, his act would doubtless fall within s. 124-A, and would probably fall within other sections of the Penal Code. But even if he neither excited nor intended to excite any rebellion, or outbreak or forcible resistance to the authority of the Government, still, if he tried to excite feelings of enmity to the Government, that is sufficient to make him guilty under the section. I am aware that some distinguished persons have thought that there can be no offence against the section unless the accused either counsels or suggests rebellion or forcible resistance to the Government. In my opinion that view is absolutely opposed to the express words of the section itself, which as plainly as possible makes the exciting or attempting to excite certain feelings, and not the inducing or attempting to induce to any course of action, such as rebellion or forcible resistance, the test of guilt."

In directing the jury as to the meaning and effect of the Explanation in s. 124-A Mr. Justice Strachey said :—

"Observe first that, as I have already said, while the first clause shows affirmatively what the offence made punishable by the section is, the explanation states negatively what it is not. It says that something 'is not disaffection' and 'is not an offence within this clause.' Therefore its object is to protect from the condemnation pronounced by the first clause certain acts which it distinguishes from the disloyal attempts which the first clause deals with. The next and most important point for you to bear in mind is that the thing protected by the explanation is 'the making of [63] comments on the measures of the Government with a certain intention.' This shows that the explanation has a strictly defined and limited scope. Observe that it has no application whatever unless you come to the conclusion that the writings in question can fairly and reasonably be construed as 'the making of comments on the measures of the Government.' It does not apply to any sort of writing except that. It does not apply to any writing which consists not merely of comments upon Government measures, but of attacks upon the Government itself. It would apply to any criticisms of legislative enactments, such as the Epidemic Diseases Act, or any particular tax, or of administrative measures, such as the steps taken by the Government for the suppression of plague or famine. But if you come to the conclusion that these writings are an attack, not merely upon such measures as these, but upon the Government itself, its existence, its essential characteristics, its motives or its feelings towards the people, then you must put aside the explanation altogether and apply the first clause of the section. In the next place, supposing that you are satisfied that these writings can fairly and reasonably be construed as 'comments on the measures of the Government' and not as attacks upon the Government itself, still you cannot apply the explanation unless you believe that such comments were made with the intention of exciting only 'such a disapprobation of the measures of the Government as is compatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority.' This, you will see, draws a distinction between attempting to excite feelings of 'disaffection' to the Government, and intending to excite only a certain species of 'disapprobation' of Government measures; and protects the latter only. What is the meaning of 'disapprobation' of Government measures as contrasted with 'disaffection' to the Government? I agree with Sir Comer Petheram that while disaffection means the absence of affection, or enmity, disapprobation means simply disapproval; and that it is quite possible to like or [64] be loyal to any one, whether an individual or a Government, and at the same time to disapprove strongly of his or its measures. This distinction is the essence of the section. It shows clearly what a public speaker or writer may do, and what he may not do. A man may criticise or comment upon any measure or act of the Government, whether legislative or executive, and freely express his opinion upon it. He may discuss the Income-Tax Act, the Epidemic Diseases Act, or any military expedition, or the suppression of plague or famine, or the administration of justice. He may express the strongest condemnation of such measures and he may do so severely, and even unreasonably, perversely and unfairly. So long as he confines himself to that, he will be protected by the explanation. But if he goes beyond that, and, whether in the course of comments upon measures or not, holds up the Government itself to the hatred or contempt of his readers,—as, for instance, by attributing to it every sort of evil and misfortune suffered by the people, or dwelling adversely on its foreign origin and character, or imputing to it base motives, or accusing it of hostility or indifference to the welfare of the people—then he is guilty under the section, and the explanation will not save him.

"The object of the explanation is to protect honest journalism and bona fide criticism of public measures and institutions with a view to their improvement, and to the remedying of grievances and abuses, and to distinguish this from attempts, whether open or disguised, to make the people hate their rulers. So long as a journalist observes this distinction he has nothing to fear. It seems to me that this view of the law secures all the liberty which any reasonable man can desire, and that to allow more would be culpable weakness, and fatal to the interest not only of the Government but of the people. But now there are other words in the explanation which we have still to consider. To come within the protection of the explanation, a writing must not only be the making of comments on Government measures with the intention of exciting only disapprobation of them as distinguished from [65] disaffection to the Government, but the disapprobation must be 'compatible' with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist that authority.

"What that means is that even exciting disapprobation of Government measures may be carried too far. For instance, if a man published comments upon Government measures which were not merely severe, unreasonable or unfair, but so violent and bitter, or accompanied by such appeals to political or religious fanaticism, or addressed to ignorant people at a time of great public excitement, that persons reading those comments would carry their feelings of hostility beyond the Government measures to their author, the Government, and would become indisposed to obey and support the Government, and if it could fairly be gathered from the writing as a whole that the writer or publisher intended these results to follow, then he would be guilty under the section and would not be protected by the explanation. Observe the nature of this 'disposition' which makes the whole difference between a 'disapprobation' of measures which amounts to 'disaffection' to the Government, and a disapprobation which does not. It is not merely 'a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government.' It is a disposition both to render obedience and also to support the lawful authority of the Government against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist it. And it is a disposition to support that lawful authority against unlawful attempts not only to 'resist' it—that is, to oppose it, but also to 'subvert' it—that is, to weaken and undermine it by any unlawful means whatever. And lastly, it is a disposition to support the Government against all such unlawful attempts whenever occasion may arise, not only against any particular unlawful attempt, proceeding or impending at the time of the publication."

In refusing the application of Bal Gangadhar Tilak to the Bombay High Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in [66] Council Sir Charles Farran, C. J., in delivering the judgment of the Full Bench said:—

"The other ground upon which Mr. Russell has asked us to certify that it is a fit case to send to the Privy Council is that there has been misdirection, and he based his argument on one major and two minor grounds. The major ground is that the section cannot be said to have been contravened unless there is a direct incitement to stir up disorder or rebellion. That appears to us to be going much beyond the words of the section, and we need say no more upon that ground. The first of the minor points is that Mr. Justice Strachey, in summing up his case to the jury, stated that disaffection meant the absence of affection ; but, although if that phrase has stood alone, it might have misled the jury, yet, taken in connection with the context, we think that it is impossible that the jury can have been misled by it. That expression is used in connection with the law as laid down by Sir Comer Petheram in Calcutta in the Bangobasi case. There Sir Comer Petheram, instead of using the words 'absence of affection,' said 'contrary to affection' and if the words 'contrary to affection' had been used instead of 'absence of affection' in this case, there can be no doubt that the summing up would have been absolutely correct. Taken in connection with the context it is clear that by absence of affection the Judge did not mean the negation of affection, but some active sentiment on the other side. Upon that point we cannot certify that this is a fit case for appeal. In this connection, it must be remembered that it has not been alleged that there was a miscarriage of justice. The last point is in reference to the definition of the word 'Government.' It is a very minor point : but, striking out the words (which were not in the original charge) Mr. Russell has alluded to, we cannot see that there has been any misdirection as to the meaning of the word 'Government.' We, therefore, think the application must be refused."

On the application of Bal Gangadhar Tilak to the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council for special leave [67] to appeal to the Queen in Council Mr. Justice Strachey's direction to the jury was elaborately criticised by an eminent counsel of the English Bar. In delivering the judgment of the Judicial Committee the Lord Chancellor is reported to have said :—" Their Lordships are of opinion, taking the view of the whole of the summing up, which is of very great length, that there is nothing in that which, in their Lordships' opinion, calls upon them to indicate any dissent from or necessity to correct what is therein contained. Looking at the summing up as a whole, and looking at each part of what was said by the light of what else was said, speaking generally of the argument which has been presented to their Lordships, they are of opinion that no case has been made out, consistently with the rules by which their advice to Her Majesty has been guided hitherto in giving leave to appeal in criminal cases, and therefore they will humbly advise Her Majesty that this is not a case in which leave should be granted." (1).

So far as we can form an opinion from the imperfect report before us of the judgments of the Bombay High Court in the Satara case, we infer that Sir Charles Farran, C.J., held the same opinion as to the meaning and effect of s. 124A. of the Indian Penal Code as was expressed by Mr. Justice Strachey in the case of Bal Gangadhar Tilak, and that an attempt to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government is equivalent to an attempt to produce political hatred of Government as established by law, to excite political discontent and alienate the people from their allegiance. Sir Charles Farran apparently also held, and in our opinion rightly, that a man may be guilty of the offence of attempting to excite feelings of disaffection against the Government established by law in British India although in the particular article or speech he may insist upon the desirability or expediency of obeying and supporting Government. The reports which are before us of the judgments of Mr. Justice Parsons and Mr. Justice Ranade in the Satara case are too [68] imperfect to enable us to form an opinion as to their construction of s. 124-A. If their construction of s. 124-A. differs materially from the construction placed upon that section by Mr. Justice Strachey, it necessarily follows that their construction would not be accepted as correct by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which accepted Mr. Justice Strachey's direction to the jury in Bal Gangadhar Tilak's case as a sufficient and a not misleading direction.

In our opinion anyone who, by any of the means referred to in s. 124A. of the Indian Penal Code, excites or attempts to excite feelings of hatred, dislike, ill-will, enmity or hostility towards the Government established by law in British India, excites or attempts to excite, as the case may be, feelings of "disaffection" as that term is used in s. 124-A. no matter how guardedly he may attempt to conceal his real object: It is obvious that feelings of hatred, dislike, ill-will, enmity or hostility towards the Government must be inconsistent with and incompatible with a disposition to render obedience to the lawful authority of the Government and to support that lawful authority against unlawful attempts to subvert or resist it. The "disapprobation of the measures of the Government" may or may not in any particular case be the text upon which the speech is made or the article or letter is written, but if, upon a fair and impartial consideration of what was spoken or written, it is reasonably obvious that the intention of the speaker or writer was to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, then a Court or a jury should find that the speaker or writer or publisher, as the case might be, had committed the offence of attempting to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India. To paraphrase is dangerous, but it appears to us that the "disaffection" of s. 124A. is "disloyalty;"—that is the sense in which the word "disaffection" has been generally used and understood during the century. We are further of opinion that the ordinary meaning of disaffection in s. 124A., having regard to the [69] evils at which s. 124 A strikes, is not varied by the explanation contained in the section.

The intention of a speaker, writer or publisher may be inferred from the particular speech, article or letter, or it may be proved from that speech, article or letter considered in conjunction with what such speaker, writer or publisher has said, written or published on another or other occasions. Where it is ascertained that the intention of the speaker, writer or publisher was to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India, it is immaterial whether or not the words spoken, written or published, could have the effect of exciting such feelings of disaffection, and it is immaterial whether the words were true or were false, and, except on the question of punishment, or in a case in which the speaker, writer or publisher is charged with having excited such feelings of disaffection, it is immaterial whether or not the words did in fact excite such feelings of disaffection.

In the case before us Amba Prasad has pleaded guilty to an attempt by the publication of the article in question in the issue of his newspaper of the 14th of July 1897, to excite feelings of disaffection to the Government established by law in British India. He was well advised to plead guilty, as on an examination of that article the only possible defence open to him was that of insanity. His counsel before us could not suggest that there was the slightest justification or excuse for the gross and libellous charges against the Government contained in the article. Amba Prasad in publishing that article could have had but one object in view, and that was to excite amongst Her Majesty's Indian subjects, and particularly amongst Her Muhammadan subjects, feelings of disaffection, disloyalty to the Government established by law in British India. The particular article taken in conjunction with other articles published in his newspaper on dates upon which, according to his own statement in the Magistrate's Court, he published his newspaper, shows that his object was to excite not merely passive disaffection, which in itself is an offence within s. 124A. of [70] the Indian Penal Code, but active disloyalty and rebellion amongst his Muhammadan fellow-subjects. The criminal offence which Amba Prasad committed is an exceedingly grave one. That offence he committed regardless of the ruin, misery, and punishment which would have fallen on any of his fellow-countrymen who might have been so ignorant as to believe that the statements which he published were true, and who, acting on such belief, might have entered upon a course of active disloyalty to the Government. Amba Prasad is not a Muhammadan; he is a Kayesth. It may be assumed, from the fact that Amba Prasad was not for some considerable time to be found to meet this criminal charge, that, if his Muhammadan fellow-subjects had been induced by what he published to enter upon a course of active disloyalty, Amba Prasad would have been at a safe distance from the place of danger.

Amba Prasad alleges in his grounds of appeal that his plea of guilty and an apology, which he tendered after he had been committed for trial, entitled him to have only a nominal punishment inflicted upon him. His conviction was inevitable. An apology, particularly made after commitment, in such a case as this, need not be considered. Having regard to the gravity of the offence which Amba Prasad committed and to the misery, ruin and punishment which he might have brought upon ignorant people, the sentence which was passed upon him was entirely inadequate. We dismiss this appeal.

[71] MAKUNDA and Badam were convicted of an offence under ss. 12 and 39 of Act No. XXII of 1881 (Excise Act), and sentenced to fines. They were arrested and challaned by a Police officer who had been invested with powers to act as an Excise officer under ss. 27, 28 and 29 of Act No. XXII of 1881. Against this conviction an application in revision was made to the Sessions Judge, in which it was objected, inter alia, that the convictions were bad unless the Police officer concerned had been authorized as an Excise officer under s. 33 of Act No. XII of 1896, and that no proceedings were taken by the Police under ss. 39, 41 and 42 of Act No. XII of 1896. With reference to these grounds and to the ruling of the High Court in Queen-Empress v. Ram Charan (1) the Sessions Judge referred the case to the High Court under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J.—This reference by the Sessions Judge of Saharanpur raises the question whether Muhammad Khan, a Sub-Inspector, was, on the 1st of November, 1896, an excise officer within the meaning of s. 57 of Act No. XII of 1896. He was, before the coming into force of Act No. XII of 1896, one of the class of officers on whom had been conferred powers to act as excise officers under ss. 27, 28 and 29 of Act No. XXII of 1881. By s. 2 of Act No. XII of 1896 powers conferred under any of the repealed Acts were to be deemed to have been conferred by and granted under that Act. Now Act No. XXII of 1881 had been amended by Act No. VI of 1885, which had introduced s. 34A into the Act, a section which does not appear to have been brought to the attention of Mr. Justice Blennerhassett in the case of Queen-Empress v. Ram Charan (1). Section 47 of Act No. XXII of 1881 had also been amended by Act No. VI of 1885. Under s. 27 of Act No. XXII of 1881 an excise officer under [72] certain circumstances had power to arrest. Under s. 28 an excise officer receiving a certain monthly salary had also power to arrest. Under s. 29 certain excise officers had power to arrest. Turning to s. 32 of Act No. XXII of 1881 we find that whenever an excise officer arrests any person "he shall within twenty-four hours thereafter make a full report of all the particulars of such arrest, seizure or search, to his official superior, and, unless acting under the warrant of the Collector, shall take the person arrested, or the article seized, with all convenient despatch to the Magistrate for trial or adjudication."

It appears to us that that section contemplated that the excise officer who arrested under s. 27, s. 28 or s. 29 could, unless he was acting under the warrant of the Collector, give the Magistrate jurisdiction to act, and that section can only be read in harmony with s. 47 by treating the excise officer who had power in certain events to take the case before a Magistrate under s. 32 as an excise officer within the meaning of s. 47. Sections 36, 37 and 38 of Act No. XII of 1896, correspond generally with ss. 27, 28 and 29 of Act No. XXII of 1881, and s. 41 of Act No. XII of 1896 corresponds with s. 32 of Act No. XXII of 1881. Section 57 of Act No. XII of 1896 corresponds with s. 47 of Act No. XXII of 1881. If the attention of Mr. Justice Blennerhassett had been drawn to these sections, we think his opinion might have been otherwise.

We hold that the Magistrate had jurisdiction to act, and we send the case back to the Sessions Judge with directions to reinstate the case on his file and to dispose of it.

MURAD-UN-NISSA AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs) v. GHULAM SAJJAD
(Defendants).^{*} [19th July, 1897.]

Lambardar and co sharer—Suit against lambardar for profits—Liability of heir of lambardar—Act No. XII of 1881 (N.W.P. Rent Act), s. 93, cl. (h).

The liability of a lambardar to pay to a co-sharer the profits which the lambardar has failed through his gross negligence to collect is a personal liability and cannot be enforced against the lambardar's legal representative. Gulab v. Fateh Chand (1) referred to.

THE facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment of the Court.

Mr. J. Simeon, for the appellant.

Maulvi Ghulam Mujtaba, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI, J.—This was a suit brought by the plaintiffs appellants under clause (h) of s. 93 of Act No. XII of 1881 for their recorded share of the profits for the years 1295, 1296 and 1297 Fasli against Abbas Ali Khan, the lambardar. The suit was brought in the Court of the Munsif and a decree was made by that Court for a portion of the amount claimed. On appeal to the District Judge, he, in exercise of the powers vested in him by s. 208 of Act No. XII of 1881 remanded the case to the Court of the Assistant Collector. During the pendency of the suit in the Court of the Assistant Collector, Abbas Ali Khan, the lambardar, died. The plaintiffs made an application to bring on the record the present respondent Ghulam Sajjad as the son and legal representative of the deceased defendant. No order was passed by the Court upon that application, and a decree was apparently made against the deceased defendant. The amount decreed included not only a share of the profits actually [74] collected by the lambardar, but also an amount which he could have collected but for his gross negligence. Ghulam Sajjad, accepting the decree as a decree by which he was affected, appealed against it.

The learned Judge of the lower appellate Court, following the ruling of this Court in Gulab v. Fateh Chand (1), held that the liability of a lambardar to pay to a co-sharer the profits which the lambardar did not collect through gross negligence was a personal liability and could not be enforced against his legal representative. The learned Judge therefore varied the decree of the Court of first instance by making a decree for a share of the profits actually realized by the lambardar. In my opinion this decision of the lower appellate Court is right with reference to the ruling on which that Court has relied. I can see no distinction in principle between the case of the representative of a lambardar who died before the institution of the suit and that of the representative of a lambardar who died after the institution of the suit; in both cases the decree which has to be made is a decree against the legal representative to the extent of the assets of

HARDEO SINGH AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. NARPAT SINGH AND OTHERS (Plaintiffs).† [20th July, 1897.]

Partition—Act No. XIX of 1873, ss. 111, 113, 241—Objection to partition—Jurisdiction—Civil and Revenue Courts.

The procedure provided by s. 113 of Act No. XIX of 1873, does not become obligatory on a Collector or an Assistant Collector in partition proceedings unless an objection to the partition has been made by a co-sharer in possession, and unless such objection was made before the day specified in the notice which the Collector or Assistant Collector is bound to issue under s. 111, and not even then unless such objection raises a question of title. Unless, therefore, such objection has been made, a Civil Court is not empowered to exercise any jurisdiction in the matter of the distribution of the land or the allotment of the mahal by partition.

[Not. F., 23 A. 291 (303) (F.B.).]

20 A. 74 N.

*The judgment in this case (Bir Narain and another v. Girdhar Lal), was as follows.—

AIKMAN, J.—The plaintiffs, who are appellants here, brought a suit under cl. (h) of s. 93 of the Rent Act to recover from the defendant, Girdhar Lal, who was lambardar of the village, their share of profits for the years 1298, 1299 and 1300 Fasli. The Court of first instance found that the defendant was liable not only for the profits actually collected, but also for profits calculated on the recorded rent-roll, on the ground that it was due to his gross negligence that a balance remained unrealized. The defendant lambardar appealed against the decree of the Assistant Collector, and the learned District Judge in appeal held, on the basis of a previous decision in a case between the parties, that there was no such gross carelessness on the part of the lambardar as would entitle the plaintiff to a decree for a share of profits calculated on the recorded rental, and not on the collections. The plaintiffs come here in Second Appeal. Since the appeal was instituted in this Court the defendant lambardar has died, and his minor sons have been brought upon the record as his representatives. In my opinion, the death of the original defendant renders it unnecessary for me to decide whether or not the lower appellate Court was wrong in relying upon the decision in the previous case. It was held by this Court in Gulab v. Fateh Chand (1) that the liability of a lambardar to account for profits unrealized owing to his gross negligence or misconduct, is a personal liability which cannot be enforced in a suit against his heir. It is true in the case referred to the suit was brought in the first instance against the heir, whereas in the present case, the suit was instituted against the lambardar personally. But as the plaintiff's claim is based on the alleged negligence of the deceased, and as it is not shown that in consequence of that negligence any assets came to the hands of his heirs, the claim cannot in my opinion be pursued against them. For this reason, the appeal must fail. I dismiss it with costs.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BLAIR, J.—The plaintiffs brought the suit in which this appeal has arisen in effect to set aside the proceedings of an Assistant Collector in the partition of a mahal, and to have it declared that a sale-deed which was executed by some of the defendants of the lands which they obtained on partition was void, the plaintiffs alleging that those particular lands belonged to them. The partition proceedings were duly instituted under Act No. XIX of 1873. On receipt of the application for partition the Assistant Collector duly proceeded under s. 111 of that Act, and the notice required by that section was duly issued. The plaintiffs' case is that they filed objections to the partition, alleging title in themselves, and no title in certain of the other persons who were recorded as share-holders or as having interests in the mahal, and that no notice was taken of their objections, but that the Assistant Collector went on and made the partition, allotting to certain of these defendants lands of the plaintiffs, these defendants having no title. The sale-deed in question was one relating to these particular lands. The first Court dismissed the suit on the ground that it was barred by s. 241 of the Act No. XIX of 1873. The Court of first appeal, misunderstanding the decision of this Court in Nasrat-ullah v. Majib-ullah (1), and not having regard to some material sections in the Act to be considered, set aside the decree of the first Court and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order of remand, this appeal has been brought by the defendants.

The procedure provided by s. 113 of Act No. XIX of 1873, does not become obligatory on a Collector or an Assistant Collector in partition proceedings unless an objection to the partition has been made by a co-sharer in possession, and unless such objection was made before the day specified in the notice which the Collector or Assistant Collector is bound [77] to issue under s. 111, and not even then unless such objection raises a question of title. The only evidence on the record which has been brought to our attention showing that any objection to the partition was taken by the plaintiffs is a reference to that subject in the rubkar of the Assistant Collector finally dealing with the partition proceedings. It appears from that rubkar that no objection of any kind was made to the partition proceedings before the day specified in the notice which was issued under s. 111. Consequently, upon the evidence on the record, the proceedings of the Assistant Collector were in compliance with law, and s. 113 of Act No. XIX of 1873, never came into application. When s. 113 of Act No. XIX of 1873, does not come into application in partition proceedings, s. 241 of that Act prohibits the Civil Courts from exercising any jurisdiction in the matter of the distribution of the land or the allotment of the mahal by partition. Consequently, on the evidence upon the record, this suit could not be maintained so far as a claim to interfere with the distribution of the land in the partition is concerned, and it follows that if a Civil Court could not alter that distribution of the land, it could not entertain a suit so far as it sought to set aside the deed of sale of land allotted in the partition to the parties who made the deed.

Mr. Gulzari Lal on behalf of the plaintiffs respondents has asked to be allowed time to produce evidence that the plaintiffs did in fact make an objection raising a question of title, and that such objection was made before the day specified in the notice issued under s. 111 of the Act. It appears to us that, in face of the rubkar of the Assistant Collector, it would be mere waste of time to adjourn this case for any such purpose, and further, it is not when a case comes before a Court of second appeal that a plaintiff is for the first time to begin to think about the evidence, if it exists, necessary to prove his claim. Litigation would never come to an end if we were to accede to such an application as that which is now made.

[78] The Court of first appeal should have dismissed the appeal to it. We allow this appeal with costs, and, setting aside the order of remand, we dismiss with costs the appeal to the lower appellate Court and restore and affirm the decree of the Court of first instance dismissing the suit with costs.

Appeal decreed.

Civil Procedure Code, s. 622—Revision—Erroneous decision on point of limitation.

The fact that a Court having power to decide whether or not a certain matter was barred by limitation, wrongly decided that it was not barred and proceeded to deal with it affords no ground for revision under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure. *Amir Hassan Khan v. IN this case the decree-holders obtained a decree for money on the 2nd July, 1884. On the 12th of April 1896, the decree-holders applied for a certificate under s. 224 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the certificate, having been prepared on the 2nd of July, 1896, was received by the Court to which the decree was sent for execution on the 4th of July, 1896. The decree-holders applied to that Court for execution on the 7th of July 1886. The judgment-debtors filed an objection to the effect that execution of the decree was time-barred. The Court (Munsif of Farrukhabad) disallowed the objection on the ground that the application for a certificate was made within time and the subsequent delay could not be imputed to the decree-holders. JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BANERJI, J. —An application was made to transfer a decree for execution to another Court. An order for transfer was made and the certificate was duly transmitted. Thereupon the decree-holder applied to the Court to which the certificate had been sent for execution of the decree. Execution was, in fact, barred by that time by reason of s. 230 of the Code of Civil Procedure. However, the Court held that s. 230 could not be applied, as the application to transmit the decree had been made within time. As a matter of fact the Court was wrong. The making of an application to transmit the decree and the making of an order thereon did not suspend the operation of s. 230. The Court made an order for execution. We are clearly of opinion that that order was wrong and in contravention of s. 230 of the Code. But we are unable to distinguish the principle to be applied in this case from the principle applied by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Baksh Singh (1), and which was also applied by a Bench of this Court in Sarman Lal v. Khuban (2). Consequently, we are reluctantly compelled to hold that we cannot entertain this application under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure to revise an order which in our opinion was bad in law, as the Court had jurisdiction to consider whether s. 230 of the Code did not apply. We dismiss this application, but we make no order as to costs.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI, J.—A preliminary objection has been taken to the hearing of this appeal by the learned vakil for the respondent on the ground that no appeal lies to this Court, the suit being one of the nature cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. The suit was one to recover from the defendant Rs. 130 under the following circumstances :—The defendant, in execution of a decree held by him against certain judgment-debtors, caused some property to be sold at auction and the plaintiff purchased it. Subsequently, the plaintiff applied under s. 315 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court which executed the decree for a refund of the sale-price paid by him on the allegation that the judgment-debtors had no saleable interest in the property sold. That application having been disallowed, he brought the present suit against the defendant, decree-holder, to recover from him the sale-price paid by the plaintiff, together with interest. It is urged on behalf of the respondent that this was a suit which was not excluded from the cognizance of a Court of Small Causes by the second schedule to Act No. IX of 1887. If the [81] suit does not come within any of the classes of suits specified in that schedule it is a suit which, under the second paragraph of s. 15 of Act No. IX of 1887, was cognizable by a Court of Small Causes. In my opinion, the suit was not covered by any of the articles mentioned in the second schedule as excepted from the cognizance of a Court of Small Causes. The learned vakil for the appellant refers to art. 23 which relates to "suits to alter or set aside a decision, decree or order of a Court or of a person acting in a judicial capacity." This is not a suit to set aside any order. If a decree be passed in the suit in favour of the plaintiff, it may have the effect of nullifying the order of the Munsif refusing to refund to the plaintiff the sale-price paid by him, but that circumstance would not make the suit a suit to set aside a decision, decree or order, which it does not purport to be. The amount claimed being a sum not exceeding Rs. 500, a second appeal is barred by s. 586 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal is dismissed with costs.

JUDGMENT.

BURKITT, J. (KNOX, J., concurring) :—This is a first appeal by the defendants from a decree of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut, dated July 10th 1893, in favour of the plaintiffs, respondents.

The plaintiffs, Musammât Said Begam and Musammât Shahzadi Begam, are daughters of the late Syed Mir Khan Sardar Bahadur of Khanpur, by his wife Hasno Begam. The plaintiffs' mother died in 1879, and their father in 1889. The present suit was instituted in May, 1892. The defendants impleaded in the suit were all the surviving descendants, male and female, of the plaintiffs' father and also his surviving widows. The plaintiffs allege that when he married their mother their father on the same day (August 11th, 1863) executed a kabin-nama, or deed-of-dower, by which he agreed that the dowry of his intended wife should be Rs. 12,000 in cash and one-seventh of all his immoveable property. They further allege that out of the dower-debt due to their mother one-fourth devolved on their father, as one of her heirs on their mother's death. They therefore sued for possession of three-fourths of one-seventh of the immoveable property, after deducting so much of it as might be recoverable from their shares as heirs to their father's estate, and Rs. 8,182 in cash.

The Subordinate Judge gave the plaintiffs a decree for possession of the property as claimed out of their father's estate, as it existed at his death, and for Rs. 4,091 in cash. The decree [83] for possession was made as against the whole estate left by the Sardar Bahadur. No deduction was made on account of the amount of the dower-debt payable from the plaintiff's personal share by inheritance in that estate. Out of the twenty-one defendants impleaded, nine submitted to the decree of the Court. Twelve appealed, and they impleaded as co-respondents with the plaintiffs one Syed Hasan Khan, son of the late Sardar Bahadur, because it was alleged he had purchased the interest of one of the plaintiffs in the decree. This Syed Hasan Khan is one of the defendants who did not join in this appeal.

The first plea argued on behalf of the appellants at the hearing is a plea which, if successful, must put a summary end to the suit. It is the second plea in the memorandum of appeal, and is to the effect that "the present suit was barred under s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure with reference to the litigation ending in decree of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut, dated January 15th, 1892."

To explain this plea, it is necessary to set out some facts respecting the previous litigation. They are as follows :—

On January 23rd, 1890, two ladies, named Bibi Jan and Bibi Sahib Jan (the latter of whom is now deceased and is represented by the appellants Nos. 7-12), daughters of Syed Mir Khan, Sardar Bahadur, instituted a suit against all the surviving descendants, male and female, and the surviving widows of their father, to recover by partition their shares as daughters according to Muhammadan Law in their deceased father's estate. Among the defendants impleaded in that suit, were the two plaintiffs (who also are daughters of the Sardar Bahadur), Mussammat Said Begam and Musammat Shahzadi Begam, of the present suit. The latter did not put in any written defence in that suit. The only defendants who appeared were the eight sons of the Sardar Bahadur. In that suit, a decree was passed by the Subordinate Judge on January, 15th, 1892, in favour of the plaintiffs, and that decree was, on appeal to this Court, affirmed on April 23rd 1897. The present suit was instituted on the [84] 21st May, 1892, more than four months after the Subordinate Judge had given his decree in the former suit, and while that decree was pending in appeal in this Court. The contention in the present appeal is that the plaintiffs respondents might and ought to have made their present claim a matter of defence in the former suit, and that as they failed to do so, it must now be held, in accordance with the second explanation to s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that that claim was a "matter directly and substantially in issue" in the former suit and that therefore the present suit is barred. There is no dispute as to the facts. It is admitted that these plaintiffs respondents were impleaded as defendants in the former suit and they did not put in any defence. A perusal of the plaint in the former suit, a copy of which has been put in evidence in this appeal, shows that these plaintiffs respondents were, conjointly with the other defendants in that suit, impleaded as being in possession of the estate left by the deceased Sardar Bahadur their father, the estate of which the plaintiffs in that suit sought to recover their legal shares as heirs.

For the appellants here our attention was called to the decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the cases of Mahabir Parshad Singh v. Macnaghten (1) and Kameswar Parshad v. Rajkumari Rutun Koer (2) and on their authority we were asked to hold that the claim of the plaintiffs in the present suit was barred by the principle of res judicata.

In the former suit, the plaintiffs asked for possession by partition of 14/120 shares out of the whole of certain specified properties (set forth in schedules) which they alleged had been of the Sardar Bahadur at his decease and were at the date of the suit in possession of the persons impleaded as defendants, and amongst others of the female plaintiffs respondents to this appeal. The contention for the appellants is that those ladies not merely might but ought to have pleaded in the former suit that the plaintiffs to that suit could not get a decree for 14/120 shares in the whole immoveable property left by their deceased father, because (debts by Muham-[85]madan Law taking precedence of inheritance) they (the present plaintiffs respondents here) had a title to three-fourths of one-seventh of the estate as it stood at the date of the kabin-nama, and to a large sum in cash, which claim should be paid before the plaintiffs of that suit could take their sharers in the estate by partition as heirs. As their father and mother had both died before 1890 the cause of action for the dower-debt had accrued before the institution of the former suit. In our opinion it was incumbent on these ladies when defendants in the former suit, which was a suit for partition, even if they did not on other grounds dispute the claim of the plaintiffs in that suit, to have pleaded, at least as a partial defence to that suit, that a decree for partition should not be made until the debt due to them, on the footing of their mother's dower, both in moveable and in immoveable property, had first been deducted from the property left by their father. The effect of the claim to the dower debt, if then made by these ladies and substantiated, would have been to reduce considerably the extent of the immoveable property and the cash out of which the plaintiffs in the former suit would take their 14/120 shares. We are of opinion that in that suit for partition these ladies should have informed the Court and the plaintiffs that they had a claim which would have the effect mentioned above, and should have objected then to the Court giving to those plaintiffs a decree for possession of 14/120ths out of their father's estate as it stood at his death, and should have represented that those plaintiffs were only entitled to a decree for possession by partition of 14/120ths of as much of that estate as remained after the dower-debt had been discharged, or due allowance made for it.

What has happened is that in the former suit the Subordinate Judge, and this Court in appeal, after deciding distributively the number of shares into which the property left by the late Sardar Bahadur should be divided, and the number of such shares to which each of the heirs (all of whom were impleaded in the suit) of the deceased was entitled, held that the plaintiffs in that suit were entitled to possession of 14/120ths of the property left by the [86] Sardar Bahadur and gave a decree accordingly. It follows therefore that, if the decree in the present case is to stand, the decree in the former suit—to which the plaintiffs in the present suit were parties—must be torn up, and considerable deductions will have to be made from the area of the immoveable property and from the amount of the moveable property, possession of which was adjudged to the plaintiffs of the former suit. Those plaintiffs have thus most unnecessarily been exposed to the trouble, annoyance and expense of a second suit, the subject-matter of which might have been decided in the former suit.

In our opinion, the second explanation to s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure is peculiarly applicable to such a state of things. The rule laid down in that explanation appears to us to be, to some extent at least, founded on the principle which underlies s. 43 of the same Code, namely, that of preventing a multiplicity of suits and unnecessary litigation. We have shown above that the present suit was quite unnecessary. Bearing in mind the observations of their Lordships of the Privy Council as reported at page 238 of their judgment in Kameswar Pershad v. Rajkumari Ruttun Koer (1), we have no hesitation in holding that this matter of the dower-debt ought to have been made a ground of defence by the respondents Said Begam and Shahzadi Begam when they were defendants in the former suit. It must therefore be considered to have been directly and substantially in issue in that suit. It follows therefore that the present suit is barred as a res judicata and should have been dismissed, certainly as far as the plaintiffs in the former suit and their representatives in title (defendants appellants in the present suit) are concerned.

As to the other defendants to this suit (some of whom have appealed and some have not), all of whom were defendants in the former suit, we note that no suggestion was made at the hearing of this appeal on behalf of the respondents, that the decree under appeal should be modified so as to exempt from its operation the plaintiffs of the former suit. Irrespective of that matter we are [87] of opinion that the present suit is barred by the principle of res judicata, not merely against the plaintiffs (as decided above), but also as against the defendants in the former suit, and even though the plaintiffs in the present suit were co-defendants in the former suit. That suit, as we have already pointed out, was a suit for possession by partition. In such a suit the decree is not—like a decree for money or for the delivery of specific property—a decree in favour of the plaintiffs only. In a suit for partition (as the former suit was) the decree is, or ought to be, a joint declaration of the rights of the persons interested in the property of which partition is sought, and is a decree in favour of each sharer. It decides what interest each of the sharers has in the property, the subject of partition, whether those sharers be plaintiffs or defendants, and renders unnecessary any subsequent suit by any of such sharers for a declaration of his interest in the property (vide Sheikh Khoorshed Hossein v. Nubbee Fatima (1), and Ramchandra Narayan v. Narayan Mahadeo (2)). In the former suit, in order to adjudicate on the relief to be given to the plaintiffs, i.e., in order to ascertain to what share in their father's property they were entitled, it was absolutely necessary to ascertain also what were the shares of all the other heirs of the Sardar Bahadur, and who they were. Those other heirs were all the defendants of the former suit, including the female plaintiffs respondents to this appeal, and the decree therefore was not merely an adjudication as to the shares in the property of which partition was sought to which the plaintiffs in that suit were entitled, but also of the shares to which each of the defendants inter se was entitled out of the property left by the Sardar Bahadur at his death. Practically each of the defendants obtained a decree for his or her fractional share in that property, a decree which he or she could not have obtained had the female respondents in the present suit put forward (as we think they ought to have done) and established their claim to their mother's dower-debt. The question whether all these defendants are entitled to their various shares out of the property [88] left by the Sardar Bahadur at his death, and not to the same fractional shares out of that property diminished by payment of the dower-debt, is, we think, just as much a res judicata in favour of those defendants as we have held it to be in the case of the plaintiffs in the former suit. For the above reasons, we are of opinion that the present suit is barred by the principle of res judicata as against all the persons impleaded as defendants in the former suit, and that it should have been dismissed as against them also.

Some arguments were addressed to us for the appellants on other points arising in the appeal, but, as in our opinion the suit fails, we consider it unnecessary to discuss them.

We allow this appeal. We set aside the decree of the lower Court and, as we hold that the suit was barred ab initio, we, under the provisions of s. 544 of the Code of Civil Procedure, direct that it stand dismissed as against all the persons impleaded as defendants. The respondents will pay appellants' costs in both Courts.

According to the Muhammadan law applicable to the Sunni sect, if a plaintiff in a suit for pre-emption has not obtained his decree for pre-emption in his life-time the right to sue does not survive to his heirs.

THIS was a suit for pre-emption under the Muhammadan law. One Maqsud Hasan sold his house in Shamsabad to Muhammad Husain. The plaintiff, Muhammad Hasan, thereupon brought a suit for pre-emption against the vendor and the vendee. That suit was dismissed on the 7th of October 1896, on the ground that the plaintiff had not proved his compliance with the Muhammadan law in the matter of the necessary preliminary [89] demands. On the 13th of October 1896 the plaintiff pre-emptor Muhammad Hasan died. On the 10th of November 1896 two of his heirs appealed, and on the 8th of December 1896 the remaining heir was joined as a party to the appeal. The lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Farrukhabad) found that the necessary demands had been made, and passed an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From this order the defendant appealed to the High Court on the main ground that "the right of pre-emption being personal, the cause of action" did not survive to the heirs of the deceased plaintiff, and they could not therefore have appealed from the decree of the Court of first instance.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BLAIR, J:—One Maqsud Hasan sold his house in Shamsabad to Muhammad Husain. One Muhammad Hasan, thereupon, claiming under the Muhammadan law of pre-emption applicable to Sunnis of the Hanifi sect, brought his suit for pre-emption. That suit was dismissed on the 7th of October, 1896, on the ground that Muhammad Hasan, the then pre-emptor, had failed to prove that he had made the necessary demands. On the 13th of October, 1896, Muhammad Hasan the pre-emptor died. On the 10th of November, 1896, two of his heirs appealed and on the 8th of December, 1896, the remaining heir was joined as a party to the appeal. The Court below found that the necessary demands had been made, and passed an order under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure remanding the case for trial on its merits. From that order this appeal has been brought.

The short point which we have to decide is—did the right of pre-emption determine upon the death of Muhammad Hasan? All the authorities of which we are aware show that it did; that the right of pre-emption is gone when the pre-emptor is a Sunni of the Hanifi sect, and has not obtained his decree during his life-time, and that the right

In this case Muhammad Hasan had not obtained possession. We allow the appeal, and, setting aside the order of remand, we restore the decree of the first Court, but upon different grounds. There will be no costs of the appeal to the Court below or of the appeal to this Court.

Minor—Suit on behalf of a person alleged to be, but not in fact, a minor—Procedure on discovery that the plaintiff was of full age at the commencement of the suit.

A suit was instituted on behalf of a person alleged to be a minor, through her next friend. The plaintiff obtained a decree. The defendant appealed, and on this appeal the alleged minor applied to be placed on the record in her own right as respondent, stating that she had attained her majority since the institution of the suit. The affidavits, however, by which this application was supported, showed that she had been of full age at the time when the plaint was filed. Held that the suit must be dismissed. *Taqi Jan v. JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.—The suit out of which this second appeal arises was instituted on a plaint signed and verified by one Lachmi Narain, calling himself the next friend of Musammât Sheorania, whom he described to be a minor. [91] Sheorania was his daughter, and the suit was instituted on the 23rd of April, 1894. On the 24th of September, 1894, a decree was given upon this plaint in favour of the plaintiff. The defendant presented an appeal, and, when the next friend got notice of the appeal, Sheorania herself came forward and applied to the Court to be allowed to carry on the suit as a major. From the affidavit which she filed, and from the affidavit which her father Lachmi Narain filed, it is proved beyond doubt that Musammât Sheorania had attained her majority some time before the institution of the suit in April, 1894.

Upon this the defendant, who was appellant in the Court below, represented to the Judge that the suit should be dismissed, and it was dismissed.

It is now contended in appeal to this Court that the Judge should not have dismissed the suit, but should have allowed the plaint to be amended and the suit to be carried on by Musammat Sheorania, or, if amendment could not be allowed, the phrase "Lachmi Narain as next friend" might be treated as mere surplusage. In support of this the learned counsel for the appellant cited the case of Taqi Jan v. Obaid-ulla (1). We find ourselves unable to follow the procedure adopted in that case. We have before us what is not a plaint by Musammat Sheorania, inasmuch as it is neither signed nor verified by her, and she, according to both her own statement and that of Lachmi Narain, is the only person, if any, entitled to sue as plaintiff. The person who signed and verified the plaint is Lachmi Narain, a person not duly authorized by Sheorania in that behalf. Musammat Sheorania was of full age when the plaint was filed, and Lachmi Narain therefore had no standing whatever in the case. The vakalatnamahs in the case are also signed by Lachmi Narain, and, so far as the record shows, the whole proceedings were carried on by Lachmi Narain, a man who had no interest whatever in the property in dispute and had no cause of action against the defendant. What purports to be a plaint by Musammat Sheorania is not a plaint by Musammat Sheorania, and [92] cannot therefore be amended by her. The appeal fails and is dismissed with costs in all Courts, which will be borne throughout by Lachmi Narain, the person who signed and verified the plaint on the record.

ABDUL HAI AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. NAIN SINGH AND ANOTHER (Plaintiffs).^{*} [31st July, 1897.]

Pre-emption--Wajib-ul-arz--Partition without new wajib-ul-arz being framed--Act No. XIX of 1873 (North-Western Provinces Land Revenue Act), s. 107.

When a mahal is divided by perfect partition into two or more separate mahals a separate record of rights should be framed for each of the new mahals.

Where under such circumstances no fresh records of rights are framed for the new mahals the co-sharers in any one of the new mahals cannot, unless under very exceptional circumstances, claim, under the terms of the old record of rights applicable to the original undivided mahal, pre-emption in respect of land situated in any of the other new mahals. *Ghure v. [R., 22 A. 1 (25) ; 32 A. 265 (282) = 7 A.L.J. 133 = 6 Ind. Cas. 17 (19).]

THIS was a suit for pre-emption of a share in a village. The village in which the property in suit was situated had originally consisted of one mahal, but prior to the sale which gave rise to the present suit had been divided by perfect partition into two separate mahals. On this partition, however, no new wajib-ul-arzes had been framed for the new mahals. The plaintiffs pre-emptors were owners of shares in one of the new mahals and the share sold was a share in the other new mahal. The existing wajib-ul-arz, framed when the village was undivided, stated that the custom of pre-emption prevailed in the village.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Moradabad) dismissed the suit, holding that the plaintiffs, not being sharers in the mahal in which the share sold was situated, could not claim pre-emption by virtue of the old wajib-ul-arz. The Court followed the ruling of the High Court in Ghure v. Man Singh (1).

[93] The plaintiffs appealed. The lower appellate Court (District Judge of Moradabad), relying on certain rulings of the High Court, viz., Gokal Singh v. Mannu Lal (2), Kuar Dat Prasad v. Nahar Singh (3), Shiam Sundar v. Amanant Begam (4), and Abbas Ali v. Ghulam Nabi (5), allowed the appeal and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From this order of remand the defendants appealed to the High Court.

Mr. Amir-ud-din, for the appellants.

Munshi Gobind Prasad, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.:—This was a suit for pre-emption. The share sold was in a mahal which had formed a part of a larger mahal. The co-sharers in the larger mahal had obtained a perfect partition under Act No. XIX of 1873. The plaintiff in this case is a co-sharer in the other mahal, in which the share sold is not, which formed part of the larger area. It appears that no separate wajib-ul-arz was prepared at the date of partition. The plaintiff's contention is that the old wajib-ul-arz still applies, and that, inasmuch as he is a share-holder within the area to which that wajib-ul-arz applied, he is entitled to pre-emption, although he is not a share-holder in the particular mahal in which the share is which was sold. The rulings on this point are somewhat conflicting; but in one of the last rulings of this Court on this subject it was said:—"The result then is that the document upon which the respondents base their right, and which was the only evidence which they produced in support of that right, is a document prepared at a time when circumstances wholly different from those now in existence prevailed and which never contemplated the existing state of things." We have quoted from the judgment by Mr. Justice Knox in Ghure v. Man Singh (6). We believe that the decision in that case is in harmony with the view now entertained in this Court. The object with which share-holders in a mahal seek for partition is to sever their connection as co-sharers [94] with other share-holders of the mahal. Some desire to separate their interest from other co-sharers because the latter do not pay their quota of the Government revenue regularly, thereby bringing liability for their arrears upon all the co-sharers of the mahal. Sometimes, no doubt, partition is sought because co-sharers cannot get on comfortably with each other as co-sharers in the same mahal. In any view of the subject it would require very strong evidence to satisfy us that after share-holders in a mahal have applied for and obtained partition and consequent separation of their interest from other share-holders in the mahal they intended that the other co-sharers from whom they had separated their interest should be entitled to come in and pre-empt in the new mahal and become again their co-sharers. It is obvious to our minds that, on a true construction of Act No. XIX of 1873, it is the duty of the Collector or Assistant Collector on making a perfect partition to frame a separate record of rights for each of the new mahals. Unfortunately it is not always done, and hence these endless disputes between the share-holders in different mahals which formed parts of one original mahal. If Collectors or Assistant Collectors would read s. 107 of Act No. XIX of 1873 with the definition of "Mahal" as given in s. 3 of that Act, they would see that apparently it is the intention of the Legislature that each mahal should have a separate record of rights. A decision of two Judges of this Court in Angan Fateh Chand v. Bibi Hamid-un-nissa, Second Appeal No. 1249 of 1892, in which an order of remand was made on the 19th March, 1894, and which was decided on the 18th February, 1895, supports the opinion which we have expressed. QUEEN-EMPRESS v. RAM PAL.* [2nd August, 1897.]

Act No. IX of 1890 (Indian Railways Act), ss. 113, 132—Act No. XLV of 1860, ss. 40, 64—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 33—"Offence"—Travelling on a Railway without a proper ticket—Punishment.

A passenger who travels in a train without having a proper pass or ticket with him has not committed an "offence." He cannot therefore be legally sentenced to imprisonment in default of payment of the excess charge and fare which may be recovered under the provisions of s. 113, cl. (4) of Act No. IX of 1890.

[R., 5 C.L.J. 47 (49) = 11 C.W.N. 100; 8 Ind. Cas. 190 (191) = 35 P.W.R. (1910) Cr.]

IN this case the Joint Magistrate of Allahabad tried one Ram Pal summarily under s. 113 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890, and ordered him under that section to pay a certain excess fare together with a penalty, and further sentenced him to ten days' simple imprisonment in default of payment of the amount. The Magistrate of the District being of opinion that the sentence of imprisonment in default was illegal, the act of the accused not amounting to an "offence" within the meaning of the Indian Penal Code, referred the case to the High Court for orders under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

The following order was passed:—

ORDER.

KNOX, J.—Travelling in a train by a passenger without having a proper ticket with him is not an offence under the Railway Act of 1890. It is true that s. 113 together with s. 106 and the sections which follow up to as far as s. 130 are all placed under a heading of "Other offences." The classification is unfortunate, for several of these sections cannot possibly relate to an offence at all, and s. 132 shows clearly that acts committed under s. 113 are not deemed offences within the technical meaning of that word. All the proceedings taken by the Assistant Magistrate are set aside and the record will be returned.

(Defendant).^{*} [2nd August, 1897.]Suit for marriage—Jactitation of marriage—Jurisdiction of Civil Courts in British India to entertain such a suit between Muhammadans.Held that a suit for jactitation of marriage will lie in a Civil Court in British India, and is not within the ruling of the Privy Council in Rajah Nilmony Singh v. Kally Churn Bhattacharjee (1).

THE plaintiff sued in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut for a declaration that the defendant ~~was~~ not, as she falsely alleged herself to be, the wife of the plaintiff, and that a child to which she had given birth, and which she alleged to be his, was not his. The plaintiff's case was that the defendant had been married to one Kallu Mir, and that the marriage was still subsisting. Prior to this suit being brought the defendant had obtained from a Criminal Court an order against the plaintiff for the maintenance of her child as having been begotten by the plaintiff, though the Criminal Court did not find that the defendant was married to the plaintiff. The present suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge, who found that the defendant was the lawfully married wife of the plaintiff and that the child was his.

On appeal by the plaintiff the defendant respondent raised an objection that the suit was not cognizable at all by a Civil Court. This objection was sustained by the lower appellate Court, which dismissed the appeal, relying on the case of Rajah Nilmony Singh v. Kally Churn Bhattacharjee (1).

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court.

Messrs. T. Conlan and D. N. Banerji, for the appellant.

Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J. :—This is a suit for jactitation of marriage which was brought by a Muhammadan named Mir Azmat Ali against one Musammat Mahmud-ul-nissa. She had taken [97] proceedings against him in the Magistrate's Court on more than one occasion to obtain orders of maintenance for herself and her child on the allegation that she was the wife of Mir Azmat Ali and the child was their child. The first Court dismissed the suit, finding for the defendant that she was the plaintiff's wife. The plaintiff appealed. The first appellate Court dismissed the appeal on the ground that such a case came within the ruling of the Privy Council in Rajah Nilmony Singh v. Kally Churn Bhattacharjee (1), and that consequently the suit did not lie. But the case before the Privy Council was a very different one. The decision apparently is one which would forbid the institution of a novel description of suit to set aside a mere assertion. A suit for jactitation of marriage is not by any means a novel description of suit: it was a suit in which relief was given in England in the Ecclesiastical Courts, and when the jurisdiction of those Courts was transferred to the Divorce Court by the Act of 1857, the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in suits for jactitation of marriage was transferred to the Divorce Court. In England it was not only a well-known suit within the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts, but it was considered proper that that jurisdiction should be continued by the Divorce Court in England, and there can be no doubt that unless a man is entitled by means of the Civil Courts to put to silence a woman who falsely claims to be his wife, the man and others may suffer considerable hardship, and his heirs may be harassed by false claims after his death. The suit for jactitation, however, is one not to be encouraged, particularly in a country like this, in which persons unfortunately are too anxious to discover forms of legal procedure by which they can annoy their neighbours. In our opinion, however, such a suit lies in a Civil Court in this country. The Court trying such a suit will of course take care, before granting a plaintiff a decree, to see that it is strictly proved that the defendant did seriously allege that the disputed marriage had taken place and that the plaintiff did not acquiesce in the claim or allegation of the [98] defendant as to the disputed marriage, and further that in fact no marriage had taken place between the parties. We set aside the decree of the lower appellate Court, and remand, the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to that Court to be disposed of on the merits.

Civil Procedure Code, s. 462—Compromise on behalf of a minor—Suit to set aside compromise as having been entered into without the leave of the Court.

Where the guardian ad litem of certain minors assented on their behalf to a compromise, which compromise was accepted by the Court, and a decree passed thereon, and was found not to be prejudicial to the interests of the minors; it was held that the minors could not, after the decree based upon the compromise had become final, succeed in a suit to set it aside on the sole ground that the Court had not previously given leave to the guardian to enter into the compromise. *Kalavati v. THIS was a suit to set aside a decree passed on the basis of a compromise. One of the plaintiffs was of full age, the other a minor. At the time of the compromise in question being made both had been minors, and had been represented by their mother Mussammat Ganga, as guardian ad litem. The Court of first instance decreed the plaintiffs' claim, holding that the conduct of Musammatt Ganga in relation to the compromise was suspicious and that she had been fraudulently induced by the plaintiff in the former suit to assent to it on behalf of her minor sons.

On appeal by the defendants the lower appellate Court (District Judge of Aligarh) held that the fraud and collusion alleged by the plaintiffs had not been proved, neither was it shown that the compromise entered into on their behalf by the mother of the [99] minors was prejudicial to the minors' interest. That Court accordingly allowed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit.

The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudhri and Babu Durga Charan Banerji, for the appellants.

Munshi Ram Prasad and Pandit Sundar Lal, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BANERJI, J.—This suit was brought to set aside a decree made on a compromise. The plaintiffs here were minors at the time of the previous suit, and were lawfully represented in that suit by their guardian. The guardian was an assenting party on their behalf to the compromise and to the making of the decree, and it is found in this suit that the compromise was not prejudicial to the interests of the minors; but the Court had not, before the compromise was made, given leave for its being made. Under those circumstances it is contended on behalf of the plaintiffs here that they are entitled to a decree setting aside the decree which was made on the compromise, and reliance is placed upon the judgment of this Court in the case of Kalavati v. Chedi Lal (1). It is said, as appears to be true, that the Court, although it sanctioned the compromise after it had been entered into, had not given leave to the guardian to make the compromise before it was made, and that consequently there was no good compromise in law binding upon the minors upon which a decree could lawfully have been made. In our opinion, there is a difference between a case in which the validity of a decree made upon a compromise in a suit in which a minor is a party is challenged in appeal from that decree, and a case like the present, where the validity of a decree which has become final, is sought to be questioned in a separate subsequent and independent suit between the parties.

Now in the present case, it has not been proved that the decree in the previous suit was in any respect obtained by fraud. It is not shown that the decree in the previous suit was in any respect disadvantageous to the minors. It would probably be now [100] impossible, if we were to decree this suit, to put the parties back into the same position in which they were when the decree in the previous suit was made upon the compromise. Further, we cannot overlook the fact that if we were to hold that a decree based upon a compromise which was not disadvantageous to a minor, but for the making of which leave had not been given by the Court before it was effected, could be avoided and set aside in a subsequent suit, we should be opening a door to ruinous litigation in these Provinces in cases in which the Court had in fact sanctioned a compromise before making a decree.

On these considerations, we dismiss this appeal with costs.

THIS was a suit for pre-emption. One Manni Lal sold a share in a certain village on the 1st of August, 1893, to Bhawani Prasad, a stranger to the village. On the 23rd of July, 1894, Bhawani Prasad sold the share in question to one Hukam Singh. On the 24th of July 1894, the plaintiffs, who were co-sharers in the village, brought a suit for pre-emption under the terms of the village wajib-ul-arz on the basis of the sale of the 1st of August 1893. To this suit only Munni Lal and Bhawani Prasad were originally made defendants. Hukam Singh was subsequently added as a defendant on the 7th of November, 1894. Hukam Singh was also a co-sharer in the village having equal rights of pre-emption with the plaintiffs.

[101] The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Aligarh) decreed the plaintiffs' claim, holding that the sale-deed in favour of Hukam Singh was fictitious and that Hukam Singh had forfeited his right of pre-emption by reason of his having purchased the property from Bhawani Prasad.

Against this decree, the defendant, Hukam Singh, appealed. The lower appellate Court (District Judge of Aligarh) allowed the appeal and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit as against Hukam Singh, holding that the sale to Hukam Singh was a bona fide transaction, and that the plaintiffs had no superior pre-emptive rights as against him.

The plaintiffs appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BANERJI, J.—Shareholders in a village in which there was under the wajib-ul-arz a right of pre-emption amongst the shareholders, sold certain bighas of land to a stranger. Out of that sale this suit has arisen. The plaintiffs claim pre-emption as co-sharers having a right of pre-emption. One of the defendants, namely, Hukam Singh, is a co-sharer having an equal right of pre-emption with the plaintiffs. He claims under a sale-deed which has been found by the District Judge in appeal to be genuine. That sale-deed bears a date prior to the date of the institution of this suit. It was a sale-deed by which the stranger vendee sold to Hukam Singh the land which he had previously purchased from the other co-sharers. The first Court decreed the claim for pre-emption. The Court of first appeal, on appeal, dismissed the suit. From the decree of the Court of first appeal this appeal has been brought.

It has been contended here on behalf of the plaintiffs appellants that, at the moment when the sale to the stranger was made, the plaintiffs obtained their cause of action. That no doubt is true. It has been contended further that the plaintiffs, having obtained a cause of action, before the sale to Hukam Singh, are entitled to a decree of pre-emption in this suit which will deprive [102] Hukam Singh of the benefit of his purchase. For that proposition there is authority. A Judge of this Court sitting alone decided, in Second Appeal No. 649 of 1895, that in such a case the subsequent re-sale by the stranger vendee could not bar the right of a shareholder to obtain a decree for pre-emption against the purchaser shareholder from the stranger. With that proposition we cannot agree. In a coparcenary village, in which, whether by custom or agreement, there is a pre-emption for the shareholders on a sale to a stranger, each shareholder of equal right has, at the moment such a sale is effected, an equal right to pre-empt the whole property sold. The custom of the Muhummadan Law in such a case has never been applied in these Provinces in cases of pre-emption arising under a wajib-ul-arz like that in this case. We refer to the rule by which all persons entitled to pre-empt are entitled to a share in the pre-empted property. In our opinion, until a suit has been brought by a co-sharer for pre-emption of the property sold to a stranger, another co-sharer can purchase from the stranger the share which had been sold to the stranger. The stranger on his purchasing a share from a co-sharer obtains a vested interest in the share, and his interest acquired by such purchase can only be divested by voluntary sale by him or by a decree in a suit. Now in this case, as we have said, Hukam Singh had equal rights of pre-emption with the plaintiffs. He purchased the share from the stranger before the plaintiffs filed their suit, and in our opinion he is entitled to hold it.

We dismiss this appeal with costs.

*Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Knox, and

GAYA BHARTI (Plaintiff) v. LAKHNATH RAI (Defendant).^{*}
[14th August, 1897]

Pre-emption—Wajib-ul-arz—Construction of document.

By the clause in a wajib-ul-arz which related to pre-emption it was provided as follows:—

"When any co-sharer wishes to make a sale or mortgage of his share, it is incumbent on him to do so, first, in favour of a near co-sharer, next, in favour of a co-sharer of his thok, and, lastly, in favour of a co-sharer of another thok, at the rate of Rs. 20 per bigha of cultivated land and Rs. 5 per bigha of waste land. If none of these take it, then he may transfer it to an outsider. If any co-sharer (i.e., any co-sharer who wishes to sell or mortgage) fail to act as above directed, another co-sharer has the right of enforcing pre-emption in respect of the property. If the term of the mortgaged share of any co-sharer is about to expire and notice of foreclosure has been issued, and the co-sharer mortgagor has not the means to redeem, then another co-sharer, after paying up the money, may take back the share, and when the original mortgagor has the means, he, after paying the money, may take possession of the share."

Held that, in the case of a conditional sale of a property to which this wajib-ul-arz applied, there were only two stages contemplated by the wajib-ul-arz, and not three. The first stage was at or about the time of the execution of the deed of conditional sale, and at that time pre-emption might be had by a co-sharer at the rate indicated in the wajib-ul-arz. The second stage was when the conditional vendee had brought his suit for foreclosure, and at that time the pre-emptor would have to pay the amount found to be due under the deed of conditional sale. When once, however, the order for foreclosure had been made absolute, the co-sharer's right of pre-emption was gone and extinguished.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., KNOX and BLAIR, JJ:—This appeal has arisen in a suit for pre-emption. The appellants are the plaintiffs, who claim to pre-empt under a condition in the wajib-ul-arz relating [104] to the village. The condition is in that part of the wajib-ul-arz which bears the heading "shafa." It is advisable to state what the whole provision for pre-emption is. It is as follows:—"When any co-sharer wishes to make a sale or mortgage of his share, it is incumbent on him to do so first in favour of a near co-sharer, next in favour of a co-sharer of his thok, and lastly in favour of a co-sharer of another thok, at the rate of Rs. 20 per bigha of cultivated land and Rs. 5 per bigha of waste land. of the property. If the term of the mortgaged share of any co-sharer is about to expire, and notice of foreclosure has been issued, and the co-sharer-mortgagor has not the means to redeem, then another co-sharer, after paying up the money, may take back the share, and when the original mortgagor has the means, he, after paying the money, may take possession of the share."

What happened in this case was this:—A co-sharer mortgaged a share in the village by a conditional sale-deed. The mortgagee, conditional vendee, subsequently brought his suit for foreclosure under Act No. IV of 1882, and obtained a decree for foreclosure and an order was subsequently made making the foreclosure absolute. Thereupon the present plaintiff appeared on the scene and claimed to step into the shoes of the mortgagee-vendee and to become in fact absolute owner, upon payment, not of the mortgage money for which the decree for foreclosure was passed, but of Rs. 20 per bigha for cultivated land, and Rs. 5 per bigha for waste land.

This wajib-ul-arz has been before another Bench of this Court in the case of Loknath Singh v. Dhajju Singh, Second Appeal No. 359 of 1895, in which the decision of the Bench was given on the 17th July last. In that case the learned Judges differed, Mr. Justice Banerji holding that the pre-emptors in that case, who were claiming under exactly the same conditions as the pre-emptor [105] in this case, could not have pre-emption except upon payment of the full decretal amount of the foreclosure decree. On the other hand Mr. Justice Aikman held that, although the foreclosure decretal amount in that case was Rs. 2,226-8-0, the plaintiffs were entitled to pre-emption upon payment of Rs. 654-8-7, the latter being the amount calculated at Rs. 20 per bigha for cultivated land, and Rs. 5 per bigha for waste land.

We are bound to say that, if the plaintiffs, in the case to which we have referred, had, after the making of the decree for foreclosure, any right whatsoever of pre-emption under the wajib-ul-arz, the only construction possible in that event to put on the wajib-ul-arz was, in our opinion, that which was adopted by Mr. Justice Banerji. To illustrate by that case the position contended for on behalf of the pre-emptor-appellant in this case, we may point to the following facts. There were three stages in the case. One was at the time when the co-sharer desired to mortgage his share, and mortgaged it. At that time, according to the wajib-ul-arz, the other co-sharers were entitled to pre-empt for Rs. 654-8-7. The next stage was after the suit for foreclosure had been brought, which would be equivalent to the service of notice of foreclosure under the Regulation which was in force when this wajib-ul-arz was made, and before the order absolute for foreclosure was made. At that time, if the plaintiffs in the former case had sought pre-emption, they could only have obtained the rights of the mortgagee on payment of the mortgage money due at the time, that is, on payment of a sum exceeding Rs. 2,000. The decree for foreclosure absolutely fixed the amount which must be paid in order to prevent the right to redeem being foreclosed for ever. The next stage was that subsequent to the making of the order absolute for foreclosure. At this last stage, according to Mr. Justice Aikman, the co-sharer seeking pre-emption was in a more fortunate position than he would have been at the intermediate stage, and was entitled to pre-empt by payment of Rs. 654-8-7, the amount calculated at Rs. 20 and Rs. 5 per bigha, as already mentioned; and, according to Mr. Justice Aikman, in [106] that third stage, for that sum of money, a person claiming pre-emption was entitled to step into the shoes of the mortgagor who had obtained a decree and an order absolute for foreclosure, upon payment of the Rs. 20 and Rs. 5 per bigha, irrespective of what the principal mortgage money may have been and irrespective of the amount at which the interest on that principal may have arrived. Mr. Justice Aikman was quite right in saying that in construing this class of wajib-ul-arzes one should endeavour to ascertain what the intention of the parties was and to construe them as far as possible with regard to that intention. In our opinion the parties to this wajib-ul-arz never could have had any such intention as that which would have been consistent with the construction put upon the wajib ul-arz by Mr. Justice Aikman.

But the real point and the real answer to the plaintiff's suit was not raised by the defendant-appellant in the appeal before those learned Judges. We are not referring to what the parties may have thought was the real answer: we are referring to what appears to us to be, upon the true construction of the wajib-ul-arz, the real answer to this suit and to the former suit. In our opinion this wajib-ul-arz contemplates only two stages, and not three. It contemplates a time when a contract of a sale or of mortgage is about to be entered into or has been entered into. The Indian Limitation Act, 1877, fixes a time within which a co-sharer desiring to claim pre-emption on a sale or on a mortgage must bring his suit. The second stage is when the conditional vendee has brought his suit for foreclosure, and before he has obtained his order absolute on the decree for foreclosure. Up to the time when that order is made absolute the co-sharer desiring to pre-empt may, under this wajib-ul-arz, obtain pre-emption upon payment of the amount decreed in the suit for foreclosure. When the order absolute for foreclosure is made the co-sharer's right to pre-empt under this wajib-ul-arz is in our opinion gone and extinguished. There is no provision as to what is to take place then, and a co-sharer not having availed himself of his right [107] to pre-empt before the order absolute, the decree of the Civil Court must take effect and must fully vest in the vendee the rights which he obtains under his order absolute for foreclosure. At that time the matter has reached the stage when it is beyond the scope of this custom or contract in this wajib-ul-arz, and the right of the decree-holder under his Civil Court decree cannot be affected.

That is our view of the law to be applied to the case. If the defendant had filed a cross appeal, we could have given effect to it by dismissing the plaintiff's suit; but all we can do now is to dismiss the plaintiff's appeal, as he has not made out a case upon which we should alter in his favour the decree of the Court below.

We dismiss this appeal with costs.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. YUSUF AND OTHERS.*

[22nd September, 1897.]

Practice—Appeal—Alteration of conviction in appeal.

Where, on appeal against a conviction for one offence, it became apparent that, although there was not sufficient evidence to support the conviction, there was evidence which might have led to the conviction of the appellants for an essentially different offence, with which they had not been charged, the Court declined to consider that evidence with a view to altering the conviction of the appellants. Queen-Empress v. Parbati (Weekly Notes, 1897, p. 130), referred to.

IN this case four persons were tried by the Sessions Judge of Allahabad, for an offence under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code. convicted and sentenced, three to death, the fourth to transportation for life. They appealed to the High Court. At the hearing of this appeal the Court, on consideration of the evidence, came to the conclusion that the case under s. 302 was not [108] proved against the appellants, and accordingly acquitted them. In the argument, it was brought to the notice of the Court that there was evidence on the record which might support, as against some of the appellants, a conviction under s. 404 or s. 411 of the Code. The Court however declined to enter into that question.

Mr. C. Dillon and Babu Satyr Chandar Mukerji for the appellants.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier) for the Crown.

The Judgment of the Court (KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.) after discussing the evidence relating to the conviction under s. 302 of the Indian Penal Code, thus continued:—

JUDGMENT.

The Government Advocate pressed upon us the fact that there was evidence which in his opinion would bring home to Yusuf, Ghulam Husain and Musammatt Paragia an offence falling within either s. 404 or s. 411 of the Indian Penal Code. A charge under either of these sections was never framed against any of the appellants, and they never pleaded to any such charge. Such a charge is of a nature so essentially different from and foreign to a charge of murder that we do not think it right to try any of the appellants on such a charge in this case. If the Magisterial authorities think there is sufficient evidence against them, this acquittal on the charge of murder will not prevent a trial upon a charge under either of the sections mentioned above. This was the course adopted by this Court in the case of Queen-Empress v. Parbati (1), a very instructive case in connection with the present, and one which we think, we should follow in the present case. For the above reasons, we allow the appeal, set aside the convictions and direct that all the four appellants be forthwith released.

Act No. V of 1881 (Probate and Administration Act), s. 50—Revocation of grant of letters of administration no bar to a fresh application.

Where a grant of letters of administration made by a District Judge had been revoked under the provisions of s. 50 of Act No. V of 1881, it was held that, the cause of revocation being removed, the Judge had jurisdiction to entertain a fresh application for the same object.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the District Judge of Benares, rejecting an application for grant of letters of administration. The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the order of the District Judge which, was as follows:—

"This is an application for grant of letters of administration purporting to come under s. 64 of Act No. V of 1881. The circumstances under which it is made are peculiar. Applicant obtained a grant of letters of administration from this Court on the 13th of June, 1896, but that grant was revoked under s. 50 of Act No. V of 1881, on the application of the opposite party on the 5th of September last, for 'just cause.' That order has not been appealed against and has, therefore, become final. Having regard to the wording of ss. 34 and 86 of Act No. V of 1881, I am of opinion that, so far as this Act goes, this Court is functus officio and that applicant's remedy now lies by a regular suit.

"This application for grant of letters of administration is therefore rejected."

The applicant accordingly appealed to the High Court.

Mr. E. Chamier, for the respondents.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BLAIR, JJ.—We are unable to take the view which the learned Judge has taken that he has no jurisdiction to entertain [110] the present application. The sections upon which the learned Judge purported to act contain no words depriving him of jurisdiction. We set aside the order of the Judge and return the application to be readmitted upon his file and dealt with according to law. The costs will be charged to the estate.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. :—This is a suit for sale under section 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. The plaintiff is the representative of [111] one Ishur Das, deceased. Ishur Das obtained three mortgages over the property in question. The first was made on the 21st of July 1871, the second on the 7th of February, 1874, and the third on the 16th of July 1874. The present suit is brought on the mortgage of the 7th of February, 1874. The mortgagors had also executed the following mortgages of this property, viz., a mortgage to Murli Singh and Sarnam Singh, made on the 30th of August 1872, and a mortgage to Bhagwan Das on the 18th of August, 1876. On the 11th of July 1883, Ishur Das brought a suit for sale on his mortgage of the 21st of July 1871, and on the 3rd of September 1883 he obtained a decree for sale. To that suit the other mortgagees were not parties. Under the decree in that suit $1\frac{1}{2}$ biswas were sold and were purchased by Ishur Das. Murli and Sarnam brought a suit for sale on the 15th of August 1883 on their mortgage of the 30th of August 1872, and got a decree on the 13th of December, 1883. The other mortgagees were not made parties to that suit. In execution of that decree $1\frac{1}{4}$ biswas were sold, and were purchased by Murli and Sarnam. On the 27th of July 1888, Ishur Das being dead, his representatives brought a suit for sale on Ishur Das' mortgage of the 16th of July 1874. They obtained a decree for sale on the 26th of September, 1888. The other mortgagees were not made parties to that suit. In execution of that decree 1 biswa $7\frac{1}{2}$ biswansis were sold and were purchased by Bechai Lal, one of the defendants to this suit. On the 18th of August, 1888, Sri Ram, the then representative of Bhagwan Das, the holder of the fifth mortgage, brought a suit for sale on Bhagwan Das' mortgage of the 18th of August 1876, and made the representatives of Ishur Das parties to that suit. The representatives of Ishur Das pleaded their rights under the mortgage in favour of Ishur Das of the 21st of July 1871, but made no mention of the mortgage of the 7th of February 1874, nor did they raise any question as to their rights under that mortgage. In that suit Sri Ram, on the 19th of December 1889, obtained a decree for sale, subject to his redeeming Ishur Das' mortgage of [112] the 21st of July 1871. Sri Ram is dead and Musammat Janki, his representative, is one of the defendants to this suit. Murli Singh and Sarnam Singh are also defendants. The other defendants not already mentioned are the representatives of the mortgagors. On the 24th of September 1888 Murli and Sarnam brought a suit for redemption under s. 92 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, against Ishur Das' representatives in respect of the $1\frac{1}{4}$ biswas which they had purchased in execution of the decree of the 13th of December 1883. On the 25th of July 1889 Murli and Sarnam got a decree for redemption on payment of the proportionate amount due to Ishur Das' representatives in respect of the sale of the $1\frac{1}{4}$ biswas under the mortgage of the 21st of July 1871. In that suit the representatives of Ishur Das did not plead their rights under the mortgage of the 7th of February 1874.

The first Court dismissed this suit. The plaintiff appealed, and the Court of first appeal dismissed the appeal, holding that the suit was barred by the operation of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure and also by the operation of s. 13 of that Code. From that decree this appeal has been brought.

The contention as to the application of s. 43 of the Code of Civil Procedure is that Ishur Das when he brought his suit on the 11th of July 1883, on the mortgage of the 21st of July 1871, should have also claimed to sell the mortgaged property under the mortgages of the 7th of February 1874 and the 16th of July 1874. We do not think it necessary to express any opinion upon that question further than this, that we are not prepared to endorse the decision of the Court of first appeal so far as it applied s. 43 to this case.

The real point upon which, in our opinion, this case turns is whether or not s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies. It is quite certain that in order to make s. 13 applicable it is not necessary that the matter of the subsequent suit should have been heard or have been finally decided by a competent Court in the former suit, when the case is one to [113] which explanation II applies. Indeed Explanation II to s. 13 of the Code would be meaningless if it were necessary in a case which was covered by it that the matter should have been heard and finally decided in the previous suit. Their Lordships of the Privy Council in Mahabir Parshad v. Macnaghten (1) applied s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure where the matter raised in the second suit had not been directly or indirectly raised, heard or decided in the previous suit. In that case they held that the matter of the second suit was matter which ought to have been made ground of defence in the former suit between the same parties, and that the appellants before them, who were defendants in the former suit, were barred from insisting on it "exceptione rei judicatæ." In Kameswar Parshad v. Raj Kumari Ruttan Koer (2) their Lordships took the same view of s. 13 and of the effect of Explanation II to that section. In referring to the matter to which it was sought to apply the doctrine of res judicata, their Lordships say (at page 85):—"That it might have been made a ground of attack is clear. That it ought to have been, appears to their Lordships to depend upon the particular facts of each case. Where matters are so dissimilar that their union might lead to confusion, the construction of the word 'ought' would become important; in this case the matters were the same. It was only an alternative way of seeking to impose a liability upon Run Bahadur, and it appears to their Lordships that the matter ought to have been made a ground of attack in the former suit, and therefore that it should be deemed to be a matter directly and substantially in issue in the former suit and is res judicata."

That decision also shows that it is not necessary for the application of s. 13, when Explanation II applies, that the matter in question should have been heard and finally decided in the previous suit. The decisions to which we have referred appear to us to be inconsistent with the decision in Kailash Mondul v. Baroda Sundari Dasi (3). We do not [114] consider that their Lordships intended to depart in Sheosagar Singh v. Sitaram Singh (4) from the interpretation of s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure which they had adopted in the two cases before their Lordships to which we have referred. In the last mentioned case in I.L.R., 24 Cal. 616, their Lordships had not to consider the effect of Explanation II.

As we have said, Sri Ram on the 18th of August brought a suit for sale on Bhagwan Das' mortgage of the 18th of August 1876. That mortgage was the last mortgage of the series. All the other mortgages had priority; consequently the holders of the prior mortgages were entitled to plead their mortgages as a bar to a decree for sale without prior redemption of their mortgages. Now the representatives of Ishur Das pleaded one only of their mortgages, viz., that of the 21st of July 1871. They might have pleaded the mortgage now in suit, viz., that of the 7th of February 1874. If they have pleaded that mortgage, Sri Ram could only have obtained a decree for sale subject, before the decree became operative to effect a sale, to his redeeming not only the mortgage of the 21st of July 1871, but that of the 7th of February 1874. It was held by this Court in Full Bench in Mata Din Kasodhan v. Kazim Husain (5) that a decree for sale under the Transfer of Property Act is a decree for sale of the mortgaged property, and that a decree for sale under that Act cannot be made for sale of property "subject to a mortgage." Before the passing of the Transfer of Property Act decrees for sale were made of all sorts of interest in properties mortgaged. Properties were sold subject to one, two, three, four and six mortgages. Persons interested were not made parties to the suits, and endless litigation was the result. One reason for the passing of the Transfer of Property Act was to strike at the shameful abuses which had arisen by reason of the procedure allowed by some of the Courts in the enforcement of mortgages, procedure which often only benefited the legal profession—no doubt a very deserving body of men—and ended in the ruin [115] of the unfortunate mortgagor, if not of one or more of the mortgagees. In order to strike at that system s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act was introduced to bring all persons interested before the Court in one suit, so that their rights might be dealt with and disposed of. The causes which led to the passing of that section and of other sections of the Transfer of Property Act are fully explained in Mata Din Kasodhan v. Kazim Husain (1), Janki Prasad v. Kishen Dat (2), and Bhawani Prasad v. Kallu (3). In our opinion not only might the representatives of Ishur Das have pleaded their mortgage of the 7th of February 1874, but they ought to have done so, and if they had done so, no decree for sale could have been made without these rights being protected by the decree. They not having done what they might and ought to have done as an answer pro tanto to the suit of Sri Ram, we are of opinion that s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies and that the present suit for sale is barred. A decree for sale as against Murli and Sarnam would be useless, for the property could not legally be sold so long as there was no right to sell as against Musamat Janki, the representative of Bhagwan Das.

For the above reasons we dismiss this appeal with costs.

POKHPAL SINGH (Defendant) v. BISHAN SINGH
(Plaintiff).^{*} [11th November, 1897.]

Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, arts. 144, 148—Limitation—Mortgage—Suit by a mortgagor for recovery of possession from a mortgagee holding over after expiry of the term of a usufructuary mortgage.

When a mortgagee in possession under a usufructuary mortgage, holds over after the time limited in the mortgage deed for surrender of the property, his [116] possession does not, by that fact alone, become adverse to the mortgagor, who still has a period of sixty years within which to sue for recovery of possession. Juggurnath Sahoo v. Syud Shah Mahomed Hossein (4) referred to.

IN this case the plaintiff mortgaged to the defendant by a usufructuary mortgage certain zamindari property on the 4th of July 1873. The conditions of the mortgage were that the defendant should return the mortgaged property to the plaintiff on the expiration of four and a half years, the profits during that period being taken to discharge the mortgage debt and interest. The defendant, instead of returning the property, remained in possession. On the 27th of February 1895 the plaintiff brought his suit for possession and for mesne profits.

^{*} Second Appeal, No. 892 of 1896, from a decree of Lala Piari Lal, Officiating District Judge of Mainpuri, dated the 23rd July 1896, confirming a decree of Maulvi Muhammad Mazhar Husain Khan, Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri, dated the 13th June 1895.

The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) decreed the claim. On appeal by the defendant the lower appellate Court (Officiating District Judge of Mainpuri) dismissed the appeal, holding that the possession of the defendant was not adverse and that the suit was governed by the limitation prescribed by art. 148 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—Bishan Singh, the plaintiff in the suit out of which this appeal arises, executed, in favour of the defendant Pokhpal Singh, a deed of usufructuary mortgage on the 4th of July 1873. The terms of the mortgage were that the mortgagee was to remain in possession of the property for four and a half years and surrender it at the expiry of that term, the usufruct for that period being held to discharge both the principal and the interest of the loan which was given. The period expired in 1878, but the mortgagee continued in possession of the property. On the 27th of February 1895, the mortgagor brought the present suit to recover possession of the mortgaged property. He got a decree from the Subordinate Judge, which was confirmed on appeal [117] by the District Judge. The defendant comes here in second appeal contending that plaintiff's suit is barred by limitation. It is argued that as soon as the term of four and a half years expired the possession of the defendant became adverse, and that the suit is barred by the limitation provided in art. 144 of the second schedule of the Limitation Act, 1877. That article can only apply if a suit like the present is nowhere specially provided for in the schedule. Reliance is placed on the decision of this Court in Gobardhan v. Sujan (1).

In my opinion the appeal must fail. The lower Courts were, I hold, right in thinking that this suit is one under art. 148 of the schedule, namely, a suit against a mortgagee to recover possession of immoveable property mortgaged, a suit for which a period of sixty years is allowed, reckoning from the time when the right to recover possession accrued. The circumstances of the case cited differ from those in the present case, inasmuch as there the suit was one between co-mortgagors and could not therefore fall under art. 148. In the case of Jaggurnath Sahoo v. Syud Shaz Mahomed Hossein (2) their Lordships of the Privy Council observe, at page 391 of the report :—"The law, wisely or unwisely, has given to mortgagors the long period of sixty years within which to bring their suit, and no Court of Justice would be justified in diminishing that period on the ground of the laches of a party in the prosecution of his rights." The mere fact that the mortgagee held on in possession of the mortgaged property after he ought to have given it up, would not alter the character of the suit, which is clearly one between mortgagor and mortgagee and falling within the terms of art. 148. For the above reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must fail, and I dismiss it with costs.

The representative of a decree-holder applied for execution of the decree without producing before the Court a certificate of succession as required by Act No. VII of 1889, s. 4. The Court to which the application was made granted execution. The judgment-debtor appealed to the High Court, by which the order of the lower Court was sustained upon production before it (the High Court) of the necessary certificate of succession. Held that an objection that the said application for execution was improperly granted by reason of the non production of the succession certificate before the lower Court did not raise a "substantial question of law" within the meaning of s. 596 of the Code of Civil Procedure, so as to warrant the High Court in granting leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council.

THIS was an application for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council from a decree of the High Court passed in an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from the judgment of a single Judge of the Court. The opposite party obtained a decree against the applicant on the 28th of June 1878 for Rs. 16,477. Application was made to the Subordinate Judge of Moradabad for execution of that decree on the 4th of August 1890, which application was allowed. Against the order allowing that application an appeal was presented to the High Court. The appeal was dismissed by a single Judge on the 6th of January 1896, and a further appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent was dismissed by a Division Bench of the Court on the 21st of January 1897.

The grounds of appeal as set forth in the application under s. 598 of the Code of Civil Procedure were as follows:—

(1) Because the respondent's application for execution of decree was not entertainable, inasmuch as it was not accompanied by a succession certificate as required by s. 4 of Act No. VII of 1889 (Succession Certificate Act).

[119] (2) Because all the proceedings relating to the execution of decree are manifestly opposed to the express provisions of s. 4, clause 6, of Act No. VII of 1889. They are null and void.

(3) Because such an application as filed by the respondent is of no effect and cannot be considered by the Court.

(4) Because the decree sought to be executed is therefore barred by limitation.

Babu, Jogindro Nath Chaudhri, for the applicant.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX and BANERJI, JJ.—This is an application for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council. The subject-matter of the appeal is valued above ten thousand rupees, but, as the decree appealed from affirmed the decision of the Court immediately below, we have to see before granting the certificate that the appeal, if admitted, would involve some substantial question of law. The grounds set out in the application do undoubtedly involve questions of law, but in our opinion the questions raised are not substantial questions of law. The question briefly put is whether this Court was right in affirming a decision of the Court below which granted execution without the production of a succession certificate, upon its being shown to this Court that such succession certificate had been obtained by the decree-holder before the order appealed from had been passed, and upon the certificate being produced in this Court before the appeal was determined. The objection of non-production of the certificate, though raised in the Court below, was not pressed before that Court, and the reason to our mind is obvious: the judgment-debtor knew of the existence of the certificate and saw no advantage in sustaining an objection which would at once be removed and would only lead to unnecessary delay. In his appeal to this Court again the judgment-debtor, the present applicant, did not raise the objection, and no doubt for the same reason. Whatever irregularity there was in the Court below was not an irregularity affecting the merits or jurisdiction of the Court to entertain the application [120] for execution. It was cured by the production in the Court of the certificate which had already been obtained. No objection could have been taken if this Court in dealing with the appeal had set aside the order appealed from and directed the Court below to cause the production of the succession certificate and proceed to execution after the said production. Such a course would have been harassing, and needlessly harassing, both to the judgment-debtor and the judgment-creditor, and would have been a pure sacrifice to the observance of technicalities in proceedings. We hold that no substantial question of law is involved. We dismiss the application with costs.

Mr. D. N. Banerji, Babu Jogindro Nath Chaudri, Pandit Sundar Lal and Babu Satya Chandra Mukerji, for the appellant.
Messrs. T. Conlan and B. E. O'Connor, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

BENERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—The suit out of which this appeal has arisen was brought by the appellant to recover [121] possession of a piece of land and a house, together with the materials of the house and the trees standing on the land, by establishment of his right thereto. Disputes having arisen between the parties concerning the said property, proceedings were held by the Magistrate of Muttra under Chapter XII of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882. The Magistrate, being unable to satisfy himself as to which of the parties was in actual possession, made an order under s. 146 of that Code for the attachment of the property. This order was passed on the 13th of September 1887. The present suit was instituted on the 7th of September 1893. The Court of first instance decreed it, but the lower appellate Court dismissed it as barred by limitation. The only question which we have to determine in this appeal, therefore, is whether the suit was brought after the expiry of the period of limitation prescribed for it.

The learned Judge of the Court of first appeal was of opinion that, as the Government was not made a party to the suit, it could only be deemed to be one for a declaratory decree merely, and applying art. 120 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, held the claim to be time-barred.

It is conceded by Mr. Conlan, the learned counsel for the respondent, that this view of the Court below is erroneous. It has, in our opinion, been rightly contended that the applicability of the law of limitation depends upon the frame of the suit as brought, and not upon the form in which it should have been instituted. We are also of opinion that the Government was not a necessary party. By virtue of the order passed by the Magistrate under s. 146 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, the property was to remain under attachment until a competent Civil Court had determined the rights of the parties thereto or the persons entitled to possession thereof. The object of the order is to prevent a breach of the peace, and the effect of it is to hold the property for the rightful owner until he has established his title.

[122] Mr. Conlan contends that the suit is governed by art. 47 of sch. II of Act No. XV of 1877, and that as it was brought after the lapse of three years from the date of the order passed under s. 146 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, it is beyond time.

Article 47 provides a limitation of three years for a suit "by any person bound by an order respecting the possession of property made under the Code of Criminal Procedure, Chap. XL * * * or by any one claiming under such person, to recover the property comprised in such order." Chapter XL of the Code of 1872, corresponds to Chap. XII of the present Code. An order under s. 146 is an order made under Chap. XII. It is also an order binding on the parties to the proceeding in which it was made. Is it "an order respecting the possession of property?" For, if it is so, art. 47 applies, and the present suit is barred by limitation. We are of opinion, that an order made under s. 146 for the attachment of the property in dispute is not an order respecting the possession of such property. An order for attachment may be passed either when the Magistrate decides that none of the parties is in possession or when he is unable to decide which of them is in possession. The order contemplated by art. 47 is, in our opinion, an order whereby one of the parties is adjudged to be in possession and is maintained in possession until evicted in due course of law, that is to say, an order which is in favour of one of the parties and adverse to the other. It could not have been the intention of the Legislature that where the Magistrate, by reason of his inability to satisfy himself as to the possession of either of the parties, or by reason of his deciding that neither of them is in actual possession, attaches the property in dispute, in order to prevent a breach of the peace, neither party would be entitled to get back the property unless he instituted a suit within three years from the date of the order, and that in the event of neither of the parties bringing a suit within that period the property would be forfeited to Government. This would be the result were we to hold that an order under s. 146 is [123] governed by art. 47. Our view is supported by the ruling of this Court in Chujmull v. Khyrattee (1) and of the Madras High Court in Akilandammal v. Periasami Pillai (2). In the former case it was held that where the Magistrate found that neither of the parties at issue was in possession, and for that reason directed the attachment of the property, the order was not one respecting the possession of property to which the three years' rule of limitation applied. In the latter case, a similar conclusion was arrived at in respect of an order of attachment made by reason of the Magistrate's inability to satisfy himself as to which of the parties was in possession. Those cases were decided, respectively under Act No. XIV of 1859 and Act No. IX of 1871, the provisions of which in this respect were the same as those of art. 47 of sch. II of Act No. XV of 1877. Had the Legislature intended to lay down a different rule from that enunciated in the two rulings referred to above, art. 47 would have been worded in terms different from the corresponding provisions of the Acts of 1859 and 1871.

It may be that an order under s. 147 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is intended to be governed by art. 47 and that may be the reason why that article was not in express terms limited to orders under s. 145. We, however, do not decide the point. In our opinion art. 47 does not apply to an order under s. 146, and we hold that the claim is not barred by the provisions of that article. The article applicable is either 142 or 144.

We allow the appeal with costs, and, setting aside the decree below, remand the case to the lower appellate Court, under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for trial on the merits.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Act No XIII of 1859 (Fraudulent Breaches of Contract by Workmen), s. 1—Criminal Procedure Code, s. 83—Warrant.

Held, that s. 83 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, is applicable to warrants issued under Act No. XIII of 1859. Queen-Empress v. Kattayan (1) followed.

THIS was a reference made under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the District Magistrate of Mirzapur. The complainant applied for warrants under s. 1 of Act No. XIII of 1859, for the arrest of men to whom he had advanced money for shellac operations, and who were at the time of which so applying resident in Ranchi in the Bengal Presidency. The Magistrate, being in doubt as to whether such warrants could be sent under s. 83 of the Code of Criminal Procedure for execution to a Magistrate outside his jurisdiction, made this reference. The following order was passed:—

ORDER.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—We hold the same opinion as that expressed by the High Court at Madras on a similar reference in Queen-Empress v. Kattayan (1). Section 83 of the Code of Criminal Procedure is, in our opinion, applicable to warrants issued under the provisions of Act No. XIII of 1859.

Held, that the order of an appellate Court abating an appeal, because no representative of the appellant was on the record, was not the "final order or [125] decree of the appellate Court" within the meaning of cl. 2, art. 179, of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, but that limitation would run from the date of the original decree.

THE facts of this case are as follows:—

Niaz Begam and Gul Begam brought a suit for redemption of mortgage and for mesne profits against Hazar Mir Khan, Bahadur Ali Khan and Har Dyal, in the Court of the Munsif of Farrukhabad. On the 24th of December, 1889, the Munsif gave a decree for redemption of a certain area of muafi land as against Hazar Mir Khan and Bahadur Ali Khan and for redemption of a certain area of resumed land as against all three defendants. From this decree the plaintiffs appealed, and each of the defendants also appealed separately. The plaintiffs' appeal as against Har Dyal and Har Dyal's appeal abated, Har Dyal having died, and no representative having been brought on to the record in his place. On the 16th of February, 1894, that is more than three years from the date of the original decree, though less than that period from the date of the order abating the appeals by and against Har Dyal, Fazal Husain, the representative of the decree-holder, applied for execution of the decree as against one Raj Bahadur, the representative of Har Dyal. Raj Bahadur objected to the execution of the decree, on the ground that it was barred by limitation, the period of limitation running in this case from the date of the original decree of the Munsif.

* Criminal Revision No. 597 of 1897.

† Second Appeal, No. 804 of 1895, from a decree of Babu Jai Lal, Officiating Subordinate Judge of Farrukhabad, dated the 5th April 1895, modifying a decree of Khan Zada Muhammad Musharaf Ali Khan, Munsif of Kayanganj, dated the 2nd June 1894.

The Munsif and the Subordinate Judge in appeal both dealt with the objection on grounds relating to the decrees in the appeals of the two other defendants whose appeals were decided on the 13th of April, 1891. The Subordinate Judge allowed the objection of Har Dyal's representative so far as it related to possession of the resumed land. The decree-holder appealed to the High Court.

Babu Ratan Chand, for the appellant.

Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR and AIKMAN, JJ.—The appellant is a decree-holder seeking to execute his decree against the interest of one Har Dyal. [126] Har Dyal was one of three persons against whom a Munsif's judgment and decree were passed. Appeals by him and against him were instituted, and by reason of his death and the failure to put upon the record his representatives the appeals abated. The claim of the decree-holder is that he is in time in taking proceedings. The decree-holder claims to execute within three years from the date of that order of abatement. The decree of the Munsif is of a date beyond the three years' period. It appears to us that the appellant has no ground for that contention. According to art. 179, the starting point for limitation is from the date of the decree or order of the Civil Court. It is the decree of the Munsif which he now seeks to execute: he contends, however, that clause 2 of column 3 of art. 179 applies; the words are "where there has been an appeal, the date of the final order or decree of the appellate Court." It is manifest to us that an order by which an appeal abates is not the final decree or order contemplated by that clause; it cannot be executed, and the only extant decree after the making of such an order is the original decree of the Munsif. The application is admittedly presented more than three years after the date of the Munsif's decree. This appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Act No. VI of 1882 (Indian Companies Act), ss. 55, 56—Company—Register of shareholders—Inspection—Refusal to allow inspection of register of shareholders.

Where a person who is entitled under the provisions of s. 55 of the Indian Companies Act, 1882, to obtain inspection of the register of shareholders of a Company applies for inspection during business hours and not at a time when inspection is prohibited, either under s. 56 or by reason of any rules framed by the Company under s. 55, such inspection must be granted, and even a temporary refusal, based upon grounds of convenience to the Company's business, will render a director responsible for such refusal liable to the penalty provided for by s. 55.

[127] THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

Messrs. D. N. Banerji and C. R. Alston, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—This is an appeal by the Local Government against an order of acquittal passed by the Joint Magistrate of Cawnpore. The respondent A. Beer was a director of the Muir Mills Company, Limited, Cawnpore. Mr. Beer was present at the registered office of the Company on the 18th of March last. He was presiding as chairman at a meeting of shareholders which was held that day. At the termination of the meeting of the shareholders, Mr. McRobert, who was a shareholder of the Muir Mills Company, Limited, asked Mr. Beer if he (Mr. McRobert) could see the register of shareholders. Mr. Beer replied that it was not convenient that he should see the register. After a little Mr. Beer told Mr. McRobert that he could see the register next day. The ground given by Mr. Beer for not allowing Mr. McRobert to see the register when he applied was that they were about to hold a directors' meeting. As Mr. McRobert was leaving the room he said:—"Then you refuse to let me see the register?" Mr. Beer replied:—"I do not refuse you; you can see the books to-morrow morning." Mr. McRobert went away. Later on in the afternoon Mr. McRobert received a letter from the Company informing him that the books would be open to his inspection at any hour up to 5 P.M. that day, or upon any day between the hours of 9 A.M. and 12 noon and 2 and 5 P.M. Mr. McRobert in his evidence said that Mr. Beer knew that he (McRobert) was leaving Cawnpore. We do not think that that affects the question in the slightest degree, for we do not think that Mr. Beer intended absolutely to exclude Mr. McRobert from a reasonable inspection of the books. The question is whether Mr. Beer has brought himself within s. 55 of the Indian Companies Act. Under s. 55 every shareholder, without payment, and every member of the public, on payment, is entitled to inspect the register of Members of the [128] Company during business hours, except when the register is closed under s. 56, and "subject to such reasonable restrictions as the Company in general meeting may impose." The law wisely provides, however, that, where the Company does impose restrictions, the books shall be open to inspection for at least two hours during the business hours of each business day. The section was introduced into the Act not only for the protection of the shareholders, but for the protection of the public. Subject to the restrictions mentioned, it gives every shareholder an absolute right to inspect the register during business hours. If it be inconvenient for the carrying on the Company's business that the register should be kept open for inspection for the whole day during business hours, it is very easy for the shareholders in general meeting to put reasonable restrictions on the right of inspection, and it appears to us that one such reasonable restriction would be that the register should not be open to inspection at any time when the directors of the Company should be in meeting assembled, always provided that on such days two hours within business hours should be appointed for inspection of the register. We can well understand that it might have been exceedingly inconvenient for the directors, whilst their meeting was going on, to have inspection of the registers going on in another room. However, the shareholders in general meeting have not placed any restriction on the right of inspection. If this was a matter of reasonableness or of convenience, we should have come to the conclusion that Mr. McRobert was unreasonable, and that it was not convenient at the moment to grant inspection. However, he was strictly within his rights and he was entitled to inspection there and then, and Mr. Beer as a director made himself liable to a penalty under s. 55 by reason of his authorising or permitting a refusal to Mr. McRobert to inspect the registers when he applied for inspection. Companies and directors must comply with the law. This seems to be the first case which has arisen in India on this point, and, although Mr. Beer acted illegally in refusing to give inspection to Mr. McRobert when [129] he asked for it, we do not think it is a case for imposing the full penalty. We find that Mr. Beer did authorize and permit a refusal of inspection of the register of members to Mr. McRobert during business hours on 18th March 1897, and that he was not justified in so doing, and we convict him and fine him the sum of eight annas. It must be remembered that if any case comes before us of a wilful and obstructive refusal when the demand was a reasonable one, we shall impose the full penalty.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—The appellant before us obtain a decree for money in the Court of the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh. On the application of the decree-holder the decree was [130] sent to the District Judge of Cawnpore for execution under s. 223 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The District Judge transferred the case to the file of the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore. The decree-holder applied to the Subordinate Judge for execution of the decree. The application was admitted and property was attached. Thereupon the judgment-debtor, who is respondent here, filed an objection to the execution of the decree on the ground that the application did not comply with ss. 235 and 237 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The application with the objection came on for hearing, and the Subordinate Judge on the 11th of April 1896, struck off the application on the ground that it did not comply with ss. 235 and 237. Subsequently the Subordinate Judge certified to the Court at Lucknow that "on the objection of the judgment-debtor the application for execution was struck off." Apparently on the very day when that certificate was sent the decree-holder applied again to the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore to have the decree executed. Her application was dismissed on the ground that the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore was no longer seized of the case and was functus officio. From that order of dismissal this appeal has been brought.

The dismissal of the first application on the 11th of April 1896, was not a dismissal on the merits and was not a dismissal which precluded the decree-holder from applying again to the same Court for execution of her decree. The application was dismissed merely upon the ground of informalities in the application itself. It has been contended before us on behalf of the judgment-debtor that the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore ceased to have jurisdiction when he forwarded the certificate that the first application had been struck off. The grounds of that contention are that s. 223 of the Code provides, amongst other things, that the Court "to which a decree is sent under this section for execution shall certify to the Court which passed it, the fact of such execution, or, where the former Court fails to execute the same, the circumstances attending such failure," and it is contended that the certificate that the case had been struck off was a [131] certifying by the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore, that his Court had failed to execute the decree within the meaning of s. 223. Reference was made to clause (b) of s. 224 for the purpose of showing that it was intended by the Legislature that the Court in which a decree was made should give information to the Court to which the decree was sent for execution as to the extent to which the decree had been executed, and as to the part of the decree which still remained unexecuted, and it is argued that similar information, when the decree had been sent to another Court, would be necessary for the Court which had sent the decree for its own guidance in case of further applications for execution of the decree. It has been now decided by their Lordships of the Privy Council that two or more contemporaneous executions of the same decree may be validly held. What might be the result if there were two or more contemporaneous sales of the judgment-debtor's property, say, one in Gorakhpur, another in Allahabad, and another in Meerut, each realizing the full amount due under the decree, is a matter with which we need not concern ourselves. What would become of the purchasers at these sales and what interest they would take, or how it could be arranged between the various Courts that the sales should not be held contemporaneously are further matters with which we need not concern ourselves.

For the appellant it is contended that the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore must have jurisdiction to execute the decree until the decree had in fact been executed or until there had been an absolute failure to enforce execution of it. The following cases were cited in the argument: Rangili v. Riayat Husain (1), Gajadhar v. Hanuman (2), Buboria Ahun Basee Kooer v. Joob Raj Singh (3) and J. G. Bagram v. J. P. Wise (4).

In our opinion the Court to which a decree is sent for execution retains its jurisdiction to execute the decree until the execution has been withdrawn from it, or until it has fully executed the decree and has certified that fact to the Court which sent the decree, or [132] has executed it so far as that Court has been able to execute it within its jurisdiction and has certified that fact to the Court which sent the decree, or until it has failed to execute the decree and has certified that fact to the Court which sent the decree. Now the Legislature, when it used the words "fails to execute" in s. 223 of the Code, could not have meant that a Court which merely strikes off an application on the ground of informality thereby fails to execute the decree. "Fails" must signify a failure after a serious and bona fide attempt by the Court to execute the decree. That paragraph in s. 223 suggests to our minds that it may have originated in an attempt to assimilate as far as possible the practice in such cases in England where a decree-holder who has obtained his decree for money sues out a writ of fieri facias directed to the sheriff to levy on the goods of the judgment-debtor within his bailiwick, and the sheriff's return (to be a good one) must be, either that he has levied to the extent of the goods of the judgment-debtor within his bailiwick, or that there are no goods of the judgment-debtor within his bailiwick. In our opinion the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore did not fail to execute the decree within the meaning of s. 223; it merely struck off an application on the ground of informality. We further consider that the case was not a case in which the Subordinate Judge of Cawnpore was justified in sending any certificate to the Court at Lucknow. Neither of the events had arisen which would have justified the Subordinate Judge in sending any certificate under s. 223, for there was neither execution nor failure. The case of J. G. Bagram v. J. P. Wise, which was a Full Bench ruling of the Calcutta Court, is an authority to show that the Court to which a decree is sent has, even after striking off an application for execution, as here, still jurisdiction in the matter of the execution. It is true that the Full Bench case was decided on s. 284 of Act VIII of 1859, but in our opinion it is equally applicable to cases arising under the present Code of Civil Procedure. We have come to the conclusion that the Subordinate Judge wrongly declined jurisdiction when he had it. We set [133] aside the order dismissing the application out of which this appeal has arisen, and we remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the Court of the Subordinate Judge for the application to be restored to the file and to be disposed of according to law. QUEEN-EMPRESS v. MAIKU LAL AND ANOTHER.*

[19th November, 1897.]

Evidence—Confession—Value to be attached to confession subsequently withdrawn.

It does not necessarily follow, because a confession made by an accused person is subsequently retracted and there is little or no evidence on the record to support the confession, that therefore the confession is to be rejected. The credibility of such a confession is in each case a matter to be decided by the Court according to the circumstances of each particular case, and if the Court is of opinion that such a confession is true, the Court is bound to act, so far as the person making it is concerned, upon such belief. Queen-Empress v. Mahabir (1) and Queen-Empress v. Rangi (2) referred to.

IN this case two men, Maiku Lal and Nathu, were tried for and convicted of the offence of dacoity under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code. Maiku Lal made a long and detailed confession before the committing Magistrate and there was also other evidence connecting him with the dacoity. Nathu made a similar confession before the District Magistrate. In those confessions both men denied that any undue influence had been used to make them confess, and afterwards they admitted that none of the Police were in the room at the time when the confessions were recorded. Before the Sessions Judge both confessions were retracted, but both the Judge and the assessors believed the confessions to have been voluntarily made and to be substantially accurate. Each accused in his confession implicated the other accused, and, as has [134] been said, in the case of Maiku Lal there was other evidence against him. As against Nathu the only evidence was his own confession subsequently retracted, and the similarly retracted confession of Maiku Lal.

JUDGMENT

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—Maiku Lal and Nathu Lal have been sentenced to transportation for life under s. 395 of the Indian Penal Code. As against Maiku there was his own circumstantial confession and proof that some of the articles stolen in the dacoity were found in his house. He is also implicated by the confession made by Nathu. As to Nathu Lal the case against him depends upon a statement made by him before the District Magistrate, which was subsequently withdrawn, and further upon the fact that he is named as one of the dacoits in the confession made by Maiku. Kunwar Parmanand, for Nathu, has argued that inasmuch as Nathu's confession was subsequently withdrawn, and as there is no evidence in the case against him, we should not accept the confession as sufficient ground for his conviction. Kunwar Parmanand has relied upon Queen-Empress v. Mahabir (1) and Queen-Empress v. Rangi (2). It appears to us that every case of this kind must be decided upon its own circumstances, and not upon the amount of credibility which was attached in other cases to confessions made. If a Judge believes that a confession made by a prisoner, although subsequently withdrawn, contains a true account of that prisoner's connection with the crime, the Judge in our opinion is bound to act, so far as that prisoner is concerned, on that confession, which he believes to be true. Courts frequently act, even in the most serious cases, on a simple plea of guilty, although in some cases it is possible that the person pleading guilty was not in fact connected with the crime. Where a confession is not supported by the evidence of witnesses, a Judge must examine very carefully to see whether it gives those details which indicate that it is a natural [135] narrative of what took place in the presence of the man making it and is not at variance with any evidence in the case which is believed, and is not merely a parrot-like repetition of a story put into the man's mouth. In the present case the confession is full of detail. It is very circumstantial, and bears on it, in our opinion, the impress of truth. There is nothing in the evidence to suggest that it was false in any particular, and it was made before a District Magistrate who would take care, so far as he could, that no advantage was taken of the prisoner. Our belief in the truth of Nathu's confession before the District Magistrate is not in the slightest affected by his subsequent retraction of it. In our opinion these men were guilty, and were rightly convicted. Although the dacoits had fire-arms with them, no personal injury seems to have been done to any of the villagers or to the people of the house, and we think that in this case we may alter the sentence to one of ten years' rigorous imprisonment, and we do so accordingly. In other respects the appeals are dismissed.

KANDHIA LAL (Defendant) v. MUNA BIBI (Plaintiff).^{*}
[20th November, 1897.]

Guardian and minor—Loans to a minor—Inquiries necessary to be made by lender—Burden of proof.

A plaintiff who has advanced money to relieve the necessities of a minor must make all reasonable inquiries as to the facts of such necessities, and having made such inquiries and reasonably entertaining a bona fide belief in the existence of such necessities, he can advance his money in safety, even though the sum borrowed by the guardian upon the security of the minor's estate is not in point of fact used for his necessities or his benefit. On the other hand a plaintiff who lends money without such inquiries cannot thereafter successfully have recourse to the minor's estate for the satisfaction of the debt. Hanuman Pershad Pandey v. Babooee Munraj Kunwari (1) referred to.

[136] THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR and AIKMAN, JJ.—The plaintiff in this case is described by herself in the array of parties mentioned in the plaint as the widow of Babu Sohan, occupation money-lending. In this case she alleges that she from time to time lent money to one Lachmin Kunwar, as guardian of her infant son Kandhia Lal, against whose estate she is now proceeding. Various sums of money so advanced at last amounted to an aggregate of over Rs. 1,600, and for that sum upon the 5th of December 1889 the female defendant executed a bond, by which, in case of non-payment, the plaintiff was to be entitled to have recourse to the property of the defendant. From the contents of the bond it is manifest that the executing defendant represented that the advances so made had been required by the necessities of the estate of the minor defendant. On failure of payment, the present suit was brought upon the bond, the mother, guardian of the infant defendant, being herself impleaded as a co-defendant. The allegations in the plaint upon which the claim is founded are that money was required for the payment of Government revenue due from the minor's zamindari property and for money necessarily expended in suits for protection of the minor's estate. The defendant minor denies his liability. He denies that he received benefit from the loan or loans, and alleges that his property was sufficient to meet all charges upon it without borrowing. He denies that Government revenue was due at the time of the making of the bond, and alleges that none was paid out of the money secured by it, nor was there at that time need for money to carry on litigation. There was a further allegation, now immaterial, that

(1) 6 M.I.A. 393.

Lachmin Kunwar had been induced by fraud to sign the instrument. The [137] Judge of the Court of first instance framed certain issues, three of which only are now material. They are:—

- (1) Was the minor benefited by the loan?
- (2) Are the necessities mentioned in the bond correct?
- (3) Is the loan binding upon the minor?

The Judge found all these issues in favour of the minor, holding that there were no necessities and no expenditure for the benefit of the minor and that the loan was therefore not binding upon him. A decree was passed against the female defendant, who did not file a statement of defence, and as against the minor defendant the suit was dismissed. In the lower appellate Court, the Judge rightly laid the burden of proof upon the plaintiff-appellant, but differed from the Subordinate Judge upon his finding that the plaintiff had produced no evidence of legal necessity. He himself treated as evidence certain decrees produced to him in cases in which the minor was a litigant, and in which on appeal in this Court, he had been successful. These cases were also, he says, test cases upon which depended half of the minor's zamindari estate. He also takes as evidence of liability to pay the Government revenue certain unsuccessful applications made to the District Judge by the female defendant for leave to borrow money on the security of the minor's estate. We do not acquiesce in the inference drawn by the Judge from these facts. But it is not upon that that our decision is grounded. There is manifestly no evidence before either Court that the plaintiff had made inquiry as to the necessities of the minor before advancing the money or moneys sought to be secured by the bond, nor was there really any evidence at all that such liabilities, had they existed, could not have been met out of the accumulations or current income of the minor's estate. In the judgment of the Privy Council in Hanuman Pershad Pandey v. Babooee Munraj Kunwari (1) the law upon this subject is considered and laid down in much detail. It is there ruled that a plaintiff who has advanced money to relieve the necessities of a minor must make all reasonable [138] inquiries as to the facts of such necessities, and having made such inquiries and reasonably entertaining a bona fide belief in the existence of such necessities, he can then advance his money in safety, even though the sum borrowed by the guardian upon the security of the minor's estate is not, in point of fact, used for his necessities or his benefit. On the other hand, a plaintiff who lends money without such inquiries cannot thereafter successfully have recourse to the minor's estate for the satisfaction of the debt.

It is perhaps unfortunate, at all events it is curious, that the plaintiff money-lender should neither have alleged any reasonable inquiry made by herself before effecting the loan or loans, nor upon the hearing should have given any evidence of such inquiry. The lower appellate Court, which allowed the appeal of the plaintiff and decreed her suit against the minor defendant, did so without any finding that such inquiries had been made, and indeed the plaintiff had neglected to supply it with materials for doing so, nor does it appear even to have had before it, in explicit evidence upon the issues which it did try, direct proof that in fact the money borrowed was applied for the benefit of the minor and that there were necessities for borrowing it.

We are asked by the plaintiff-respondent to refer to the Court below an issue as to whether reasonable inquiries had been made by the plaintiff. We do not think we ought to grant her that grace; she certainly is not entitled to it as a matter of law. This is a suit substantially by a money-lender against a minor, and it is not the practice of this Court, or Courts elsewhere, to step out of their way for the purpose of visiting upon a minor liabilities contracted during the period of his minority. We are therefore of opinion that the decree of the lower appellate Court is a decree based upon evidence which does not establish a right of suit on the part of the plaintiff as against the minor. We, therefore, setting aside the decree of the lower appellate Court against the minor and restoring the decree of the Court of first instance, allow the appeal with costs.

ON the 21st July 1888 Lalta Prasad and Har Prasad obtained a decree for sale on a mortgage from the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly against Aziz-ud-din Ahmad and Hafiz-ud-din Ahmad. The defendants appealed, and on the 16th of March 1891 the High Court set aside the decree and dismissed the plaintiffs' suit with costs. The defendants assigned their decree for costs to one Sadiq Husain. On the 16th July 1891, Sadiq Husain applied for execution of the decree assigned to him against the plaintiffs, and on the 23rd July 1891 obtained payment of the amount of costs decreed. On the 24th July 1891, the plaintiffs applied to the High Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council. Leave was granted, and ultimately, on the 5th of August 1895, the Privy Council decreed the appeal and restored the decree of the Court of first instance in favour of the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs did not make Sadiq Husain a party to their appeal to the Privy Council. The decree of the Privy Council was in due course transmitted for execution to the

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—This appeal arises out of an application to the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly made in execution of a decree of Her Majesty in Council. In the suit in which that decree was passed the plaintiffs obtained from the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly a decree for sale on a mortgage with costs. On appeal this Court set aside the decree of the Subordinate Judge and dismissed the suit with costs. That decree of this Court, which was in favour of the defendants, was assigned by the defendants to Sadiq Husain, we presume for consideration. On the 16 of July 1891, Sadiq Husain applied under s. 232 of the Code of Civil Procedure for execution of the decree which had been assigned to him for Rs. 4,820, the amount of the costs decreed by this Court in favour of the defendants. Of that application the plaintiffs had notice; they were parties to it. Sadiq Husain obtained an order, and, in execution of the decree assigned to him, he obtained, on the 23rd of July 1891, payment of Rs. 4,820. On the 24th of July 1891, the plaintiffs in the suit applied to this Court for leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council. The appeal lay as a matter of right. Leave was granted; and finally the appeal came before Her Majesty in Council, with the result that the decree of this Court was set aside and the decree of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly was restored with costs. That order of Her Majesty in Council was communicated to this Court, and on the application of the [141] plaintiffs this Court transmitted that order to the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly for the execution of the same. After the arrival of the order of Her Majesty in Council in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly, the plaintiffs in the suit presented an application to the Subordinate Judge asking for an order of restitution against Sadiq Husain in respect of the Rs. 4,820-13-0 already mentioned and for Rs. 1,390-13-0, interest on that amount, making a total of Rs. 6,211-10-0. Sadiq Husain was no party to the appeal to Her Majesty in Council.

From what we have said it appears, as was the fact, that the plaintiffs had actually satisfied, by payment to Sadiq Husain, the decree for costs before they moved at all in the matter of appealing to Her Majesty in Council. They consequently had full knowledge that Sadiq Husain was the assignee of that decree and that he was a person interested to maintain that decree in its integrity so far as costs were concerned. Notwithstanding that the plaintiffs knew of Sadiq Husain's interest, they filed their appeal to Her Majesty in Council and proceeded with that appeal without making Sadiq Husain a party to it. When the appeal to Her Majesty in Council came on for hearing, the defendants, apparently through an oversight, were not represented. Sadiq Husain of course was not represented, being no party to the appeal, and the appeal to Her Majesty in Council was decreed in the absence, not only of the defendants but of the assignee of the decree. Sadiq Husain was not even made a party to the application to this Court to put the order of Her Majesty in Council into execution under s. 610 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The decree of Her Majesty in Council was against the respondents to the appeal. Sadiq Husain was not a respondent. It was not until the order of Her Majesty in Council arrived in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly, that the plaintiffs in the suit sought for any remedy whatsoever against Sadiq Husain. What they seek is an order under which Sadiq Husain's goods and his lands may be seized and sold, and the proceeds up to Rs. 6,211-10-0 be paid over to the plaintiffs. It is contended that [142] because the order of Her Majesty in Council ordered this Court to govern itself according to that order, this Court and the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Bareilly are bound to make Sadiq Husain by the process of the Court, i.e., by execution had against his goods or lands, pay to the plaintiffs the amount they claim. It is admitted that s. 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not apply to this case. It is obvious that that section does not apply. The decree under which the plaintiffs are seeking a benefit is an order of Her Majesty in Council, and not a decree passed under Chapter XLI of the Code of Civil Procedure. Further, s. 583 only applies to parties to the proceedings in the suit and in the appeal, and does not apply to assignees of interests of the parties to the suit when those assignees have not been made parties to the suit or the appeal. Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji is unable to point out to us any section in the Code of Civil Procedure under which we could make an order which would justify the officer of the Court in seizing and selling in execution of the order of Her Majesty in Council, the goods or lands of a person who was no party to the appeal to Her Majesty in Council and who is not even either named or referred to in the order of Her Majesty in Council. Mr. Dwarka Nath Banerji's argument went as far as this, that this Court had not even discretion in the matter, that we were merely exercising ministerial functions, and that under the order of Her Majesty in Council we were bound to restore to the successful appellants the moneys they had paid to the assignee of the decree of this Court. According to that contention it would be immaterial whether Sadiq Husain could prove any matter of estoppel between him and these plaintiffs, as, for instance, that he had purchased the decree of this Court on the representation of the plaintiffs that they would not appeal. A somewhat similar case was before this Court last year, viz., Bhagwati Prasad v. Jamna Prasad (1). We have been referred to Rodger v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (2) and to Syud Bazayet Hossein v. Dooli Chand (3). [143] In our opinion neither of these cases has any bearing on the one before us. If the plaintiffs had desired to obtain a remedy against Sadiq Husain through the medium of an order of Her Majesty in Council, they had ample notice of the assignment to him—they had actually paid him—and they could have made him a party to their appeal; but for reasons best known to themselves they did not do so. The plaintiffs are not asking to follow immovable property decreed to them in the appeal by order of Her Majesty in Council. They are asking to turn this decree against the defendants into a decree against Sadiq Husain, who was no party to the proceedings, and to put it into execution against his goods and his lands as if it had been a decree for money passed against him. In our opinion we have no jurisdiction to make any order for the execution of this order of Her Majesty in Council against Sadiq Husain. Equally in our opinion the Subordinate Judge had no jurisdiction to make the order which he made and which is now under appeal.

(1) 19 A. 136.

(3) 5 I.A. 211.

We allow this appeal and dismiss the application to the Subordinate Judge against Sadiq Husain with costs in both Courts.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—Musammatt Tulsha has been convicted of the offence punishable under s. 307 of the Indian Penal Code, and has been sentenced to transportation for life. She was a young woman of twenty or twenty-one years of age and was a widow, her husband having died before the gauna ceremony was performed. She had a lover named Tika Ram, who was of the same caste as herself. She was anxious to live with him, but her father and family were opposed to her taking that course, as in their caste the marriage of widows was forbidden. Musammatt Tulsha prepared the family meal, and of that meal her father her mother and her brother partook. They were afterwards seized with illness and exhibited symptoms of poisoning by datura. A native doctor was called in, who, recognizing what they were suffering from, refused to treat them and communicated with the police. The police arrived that night. The three members of the family who were suffering were removed to the dispensary and ultimately recovered. Musammatt Tulsha was taken into custody, and she gave up a packet containing thirty-one datura seeds. She made a statement before the Magistrate in which she admitted that she had administered datura to her father, her mother and her brother in the food she had given. That statement was subsequently withdrawn, but, as it is entirely consistent with all the evidence in the case which we believe, we accept that statement as true notwithstanding its withdrawal. In the Court of Session her relations, in order to shield her, tried to make out a different case, namely, that what they were suffering from was the result of drinking bhang. We are quite satisfied that Musammat Tulsha administered datura to her father, her mother and her brother. Mr. Sorabji, who appeared for her, has contended that there is nothing to suggest that she intended to commit murder, and that there is no evidence that she knew that datura when administered might cause death. It is probable that Musammat Tulsha did not intend to kill her parents and her [145] brother. No doubt she intended to incapacitate them for the time that she might fly with her lover. There is no evidence that she knew that datura when administered to a human being might cause death. The same might have been said if she had administered arsenic or nux vomica. It appears to us that we must presume that people of her age have the ordinary knowledge of what the results may be of administering datura. It would be dangerous in the extreme to the public in this country if Judges were to hold that it could not be presumed that a woman of twenty years of age in an Indian village was not aware that death might be caused by the administration of datura. If we were to hold that such was the presumption, we fear that poisoning by datura would become more frequent than it is. In our opinion Musammat Tulsha was properly convicted. It was a case to which the sentence of transportation applied, and that was the proper sentence to pass. As the Sessions Judge truly observes, this woman's act might have resulted in the deaths of three persons.

We dismiss this appeal.

Arbitration—Submission to arbitration—Revocation of submission.

A submission to arbitration once made cannot be revoked except for good cause. It cannot be revoked at the mere will of one of the parties to it. Pestonjee Nussurwanjee v. Manockjee & Co. (1), referred to.

THIS was an application under s. 525 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have an award filed in Court and a decree passed in accordance therewith. The award was made ostensibly by one Chandar Sen, the clerk of a pleader, by name Raghubir [146] Saran, practising at Meerut, but with the advice and assistance of his master. The application was opposed on several grounds, amongst others, on the ground that the objector, having come to know that Raghubir Saran had originally been instructed by the other parties to the reference to file a suit against him in the matter dealt with by the award, had revoked his submission to arbitration. This objection was disallowed by the Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Meerut) which passed a decree in accordance with the award. The judgment-debtor appealed, urging the same objections as he had urged in the first Court. The lower appellate Court (District

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR, J.—This is the appeal of an unsuccessful party to arbitration proceedings. The only point opened in second appeal is whether the award made was in point of law an award. It seems to me that the findings of fact by the learned Judge do amount to this, that the award is the expression of the mind and the will of the person who was nominated arbitrator. The award is of course signed by him. It might have been possible for objection to be taken to the arbitration proceedings upon the ground of the interference of the arbitrator's master, a pleader, had not such interference taken place with the full assent of the present appellant. In the face of such consent on his part it would not be open to him to revoke his consent to the arbitration proceedings. It would not lie in his mouth to urge as good cause for such revocation anything done by the arbitrator in the course of the proceedings, if the thing done was what he himself had assented to. I think the finding of the Judge that the award is the award of the arbitrator Chander Sen means, not only that he signed the award but that it was in the fullest legal sense his award, though the conclusions arrived at may have [147] been influenced by another person, who, by the consent of the parties, was an assisting party to the arbitration proceedings. I see no reason to disturb the findings of the Judge. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

AIKMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The respondent applied under s. 525 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have an award filed in Court. The application was resisted by the appellant here, but the Court made an order against him under the provisions of s. 526 of the Code. On appeal the order was confirmed by the District Judge. In this second appeal it is urged that there was no valid award. That is the only ground upon which he could interfere. The reference to arbitration shows that the parties appointed one Chander sen, the clerk of a pleader named Babu Raghbir Saran, as arbitrator to decide the matters in dispute between them. The award on the face of it purports to have been made by the arbitrator chosen by the parties. It is, however, contended that the person who did really make the award was Chander Sen's master Raghbir Saran. It has been found by the lower appellate Court that Chander Sen was selected by the parties on his master Raghbir Saran promising to help him in every way. That Chander Sen took more than a nominal part in the proceedings is clear from the evidence of Raghbir Saran, a witness whom the Judge describes as absolutely above suspicion. Even if Chander Sen allowed himself to be unduly influenced by Raghbir Saran, that would not under the circumstances of this case amount to misconduct on his part and would not be a matter with which we could deal in appeal.

The learned counsel for the appellant further contended that the award was invalid, inasmuch as his client had revoked the submission to arbitration before the award was pronounced. The learned counsel went so far as to contend that a party who refers a question to arbitration can at his pleasure, and without any cause shown, withdraw from the submission at any time before the award has been given. On this point he referred [148] to Russell on the Power and Duty of an Arbitrator.

This is a proposition to which I cannot assent. In the case of Pestonjee Nussurwanjee v. Manockjee & Co. (1) it was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council that "where parties had agreed to submit the matter in difference between them to the arbitration of one or more specified persons, no party to such agreement could revoke the submission unless for good cause, and that a mere arbitrary revocation of authority would not be permitted." The learned counsel has entirely failed to show that any good cause, existed which would have justified his client in withdrawing from the submission, if he withdrew at all, which is open to doubt. I think the lower appellate Court properly dismissed the appeal.

One Puran Mal, a co-sharer in the village in which the land sold was situate, died on the 6th of December 1893 leaving a widow Kesar Kuar and a daughter Dal Kuar. On the 22nd of January 1894, one Jagannath sold to the defendant Muhammad Yusuf Ali Khan, who was a stranger, a share in the village in which Puran Mal had been a co-sharer. Subsequently to this sale [149] Kesar Kuar relinquished, in favour of her daughter Dal Kuar all her rights in the property which had been of Puran Mal in his lifetime, and mutation of names was effected in favour of Dal Kuar on the 2nd of May 1894. On the 21st of January 1895 Dal Kuar brought a suit for pre-emption in respect of the sale to Muhammad Yusuf Ali Khan of the 22nd of January 1894. The plaintiff's claim was decreed by the Court of first instance (Munsif of Etah). The defendant-vendee appealed, and his appeal was dismissed by the lower appellate Court (District Judge of Mainpuri). The defendant-vendee thereupon appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR, J. (AIKMAN, J. concurring).—This is a pre-emption suit based upon the wajib-ul-arzes of two villages. The plaintiff is the daughter of one Puran Mal, and the title she alleges is that upon her father's death, the widowed mother, having become entitled to a life estate in the property, relinquished all her rights to the plaintiff, who thereupon entered into possession and was duly recorded as a co-sharer.

The sale which constituted the cause of action took place on the 22nd of January 1894. Puran Mal died on the 6th of December 1893. The appellant represented by Mr. Mujtaba, disputes the right of the plaintiff to pre-empt upon the ground that the voluntary relinquishment of the mother to the daughter, after the completion of the sale, could not confer upon her any right of pre-emption. In support of that contention Mr. Ghulam Mujtaba cited to us a Full Bench case, Sheo Narain v. Hira (1). That case is not on all fours with the case we have to decide. It was a sale to a person other than a co-sharer, and the plaintiff who claimed to pre-empt was himself a stranger who had purchased a share in the village. The inconveniences which formed the basis of that decision are set forth in detail in the judgment, and no doubt formed a very substantial part of the [150] ratio decidendi. Differing from the present case in that very material respect, that case affords no guidance to us in a case where the person claiming to pre-empt is not a stranger who has acquired a share in the village. There is another argument used in the judgment of Mr. Justice Mahmood to support the decision, the propriety of which I do not question, which appears to me to be based upon a misconception. It occurs in the following words:—"Now, if at the time of the sale the person who at that time owned the share purchased by the plaintiff had no objection to the sale, that sale gave rise to no cause of action, and nothing which happened afterwards could create one." That observation leaves out of sight that there was ample time still for the original owner of the property, had he lived, to take objection; the period for such objection had not expired, and it seems to me impossible to say that the abstinence from objection for some portion, and a portion only, of that time raised any inference of the abandonment of a claim to pre-empt. It is settled law that a widow holding a life estate, and not holding possession of land in lieu of maintenance, represents the estate in the fullest manner, and such plenary possession seems to me to carry with it the right to pre-empt. I find it difficult to conceive upon what principle applicable to pre-emptive rights, based not on Muhammadan Law but upon the wajib-ul-arz, which must be taken to be the basis of the rights of the co-sharers, it would be possible to justify the exclusion of a co-sharer from pre-emption, to whom the widow's life estate has been relinquished, and who herself would have had plenary proprietary rights on the determination of the life estate. There seems to be no doubt that the widow had power to make a good and legal relinquishment. As I have already said, I cannot infer from the fact that the widow took no objection for some brief time before the relinquishment, that there was on her part an abandonment of pre-emptive rights. It would seem upon general principles that the period within which the pre-emptive rights can be exercised is not limited by a devolution of the estate from one co-sharer to another co-sharer. In the case of a [151] wajib-ul-arz I think the expression excluding such a right must be clear and imperative before I could find that so important an incident of proprietary possession could be lost by such devolution. It is to be regretted that the respondent was not represented in the argument upon this appeal, but I feel no doubt that Mr. Mujtaba has brought to bear upon the matter all cases which might help to guide the decision of the Bench. On the whole I am of opinion that the Courts below were right in their decision. I would dismiss the appeal.

[25th November, 1897.]

Act No. XLV of 1860 (Indian Penal Code), s. 177—False information—Police Officer recording a false report.

Held that a Police officer at a police station, who, being as such officer bound to enter all reports brought to him of cognizable or non-cognizable offences in the station diary, refused to enter a report made to him concerning the commission of an offence, and entered instead in the diary a totally different and false report as that which was made to him, had thereby committed the offence punishable under s. 177 of the Indian Penal Code.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court. The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown. Mr. Dillon, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—This is an appeal brought by the Local Government against an order of the Sessions Judge of Farrukhabad acquitting Muhammad Ismail Khan of offences punishable under ss. 177 and 218 of the Indian Penal Code.

On the 23rd of January last, Muhammad Ismail Khan was a head constable stationed at Kaimganj police station. It was [152] his duty to enter all reports made at the station as to cognizable or non-cognizable offences, and to enter them in the station diary. On the evening of that day, whilst Muhammad Ismail Khan was on duty, Banwari Lal and Bansidhar with two other men, Balla and Udho, came to the thana to make a report that Banwari Lal had been robbed on that evening of Rs. 454, which his servant Udho was carrying, and that the robbers who had made the attack had succeeded in carrying away the bag in which the money was and had escaped.

Banwari Lal and his companions made their statement to Muhammad Ismail Khan and asked him to enter the report. Muhammad Ismail Khan said that they wanted to get up a case and told them to wait. They waited until 1 o'clock in the morning, and then left. Muhammad Ismail Khan did enter a report in the general diary that night as made by Balla accompanied by Bansidhar. It was not a report of a robbery ; it was a report that a milkman had beaten Balla. No such report had been made. It so happened that, at the time Banwari Lal and his companions were at the station, the police were busy with a murder case just reported. Now the Sessions Judge has found that no such report as that alleged by the witnesses for the prosecution was made at all. The assessors suggested that Banwari Lal and his companions wished to hush up the case of the robbery and consequently made a false report which was then entered in the general diary. The Sessions Judge observes that that was a simple explanation, and he accepted it. In one sense of the word "simple" it was simple enough ; so foolish that we should have expected the Sessions Judge to have rejected it. It might have struck him that these banias who had taken the trouble to go at that hour of the night more than a mile to the thana to report a robbery, which the Sessions Judge believed to have been committed (and which we have no doubt was committed), and remained there from 8 o'clock in the night until 1 o'clock next morning in order to have the matter reported, had not gone to the thana to make a false report of an assault that had not been committed, and [153] which, if it had been committed, did not concern either Bansidhar or Banwari Lal, the two chief men—a false report which might make them liable to punishment under s. 211 of the Indian Penal Code. We are satisfied that the banias did report that a robbery had been committed that night, and that they did not report any assault by a milkman on their porter.

It is easy to understand what happened. The Sub-Inspector at the time was absent investigating another case ; there comes in a report of a murder that had taken place ; then comes this report of a robbery. We have no doubt that at the police station they did not want to trouble about this case of robbery, in which none of the robbers had been identified, and in which what was carried away was rupees, which could not be traced, and in which there was little chance that an arrest would have been made or a conviction obtained. They thought they would keep the charge out of the books and not spoil their naqshas by showing an undetected offence of robbery committed in the street under their noses.

We are of opinion that s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code does not apply to this case. No doubt it is injurious to the public that such serious offences as robbery should be hushed up, but unfortunately the definition of "injury" contained in the Penal Code does not cover anything that took place that night at the thana. We can well understand that cases of falsification of reports may occur which come within the purview of s. 218. All we decide is that this case does not. There is nothing in this case to show that Muhammad Ismail Khan intended to cause loss or injury to the public or to any person, or that he intended to save, or knew he was likely to save, anyone from punishment or had any of the other intents mentioned in s. 218, when he suppressed the real report and entered the false one.

We are of opinion, and we find, that Muhammad Ismail Khan did commit an offence punishable under s. 177 of the Indian Penal Code. He was bound by law to enter in the general diary [154] all reports of cognizable and non-cognizable cases made to him at the thana. It is needless to say that this duty involved that he should truthfully enter those reports. One object of that diary is to inform the Magistrate of the District and the District Superintendent of Police of the offences which have been reported at the thana. In that sense the diary furnishes them with "information," and at this particular thana it was the duty of Muhammad Ismail Khan to furnish such information to the Magistrate of the District and the District Superintendent of Police by means of the truthful entry of reports made to him. What he did was—he furnished by means of a false entry information which he knew to be false. He suppressed the real report, and entered a report which had not been made. Indeed we would be prepared to hold that Muhammad Ismail Khan in not entering the report which was made to him, even if he had made no entry at all, would have brought himself under s. 177, as the result would have been that he would have thereby informed the Magistrate of the District and the District Superintendent of Police that no report of a cognizable offence had been made, which would have been false information. It is absolutely necessary in the interests of the public that Police officers charged with the duty of entering these reports should enter them truthfully. We regard this as a serious case. A grave offence had been committed, and the action of Muhammad Ismail Khan, possibly countenanced by some other Police officer, that night has resulted in no inquiry so far as we are aware, having been instituted in respect of this highway robbery. We are aware that this class of offence is committed in certain districts; that reports made have been minimised and minor offences entered when a graver offence was in fact reported. We cannot pass over this offence lightly. We set aside the order of acquittal, and we convict Muhammad Ismail Khan of the offence punishable under s. 177, and sentence him to be rigorously imprisoned for eighteen calendar months: the imprisonment will begin from the time when he is taken into custody to undergo this sentence.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. ZAWAR HUSEN AND OTHERS.*
[26th November, 1897.]

Evidence—Prosecution witness examined before the Magistrate but not called in the Court of Session—Witness called by defence—Cross examination by defending counsel disallowed.

Where the prosecution declined to call in the Court of Session a witness for the Crown who had been examined in the Magistrate's Court, and such witness was thereupon placed in the witness-box by counsel for the defence, it was held that counsel for the defence was not entitled to commence his examination of the witness by questioning him as to what he had deposed in the Magistrate's Court. Questions as to his previous deposition were under the circumstances only admissible by way of cross-examination, with the permission of the Court, if the witness proved himself a hostile witness.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court.
Mr. C. Dillon, for the appellants Miru and Phullu.
Mr. G. P. Boys, for the appellant Zawar Husen.
The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—Zawar Husen, Miru and Phullu have been found guilty of the offence punishable under s. 307 of the

* Criminal Appeal No. 1302 of 1897.

Indian Penal Code and have been respectively sentenced to transportation for life. They have appealed.

As to Zawar Husen, his contention is that he established an alibi. As to the other two men the contention is that they were not present, and that if Zawar Husen's alibi is believed, the case for the prosecution is entirely shaken and the evidence against Miru and Phullu cannot be trusted.

That a deliberate attempt was made to take the life of Imdad Husen some time between midnight and 2 A.M. is beyond doubt. Whoever the persons were who attacked him, they could have had but one intention, and that was to kill him. The question is were these three men, or any of them, members of the party that attacked Imdad Husen?

Zawar Husen's alibi is that he was in Allahabad up to 9-30 P.M. on the night in question, and could not have caught a train which would have taken him to Bharwari after that hour, and [156] that he could not have ridden from Allahabad to the neighbourhood of Bharwari, where the crime was committed, in time to be present at its commission.

To prove the alibi he called one Muhammad Mehdi, who gave the very vaguest evidence as to time. He said that Zawar Husen called on him at 8, 8-30, 8-45 or 9 o'clock that night, and remained with him until he, Muhammad Mehdi, retired to bed. He fixes that hour at 9-30 by the fact that that is his usual hour for retiring. Another witness (from Benares) is called to prove that Zawar Husen was at Muhammad Mehdi's until after 9-30 that night. We have very little doubt that Zawar Husen was doing, what many others in this country have done before, namely, arranging for an alibi in view of his taking part in the commission of a crime of a serious nature. Whether Mr. Muhammad Mehdi was particularly drowsy on the night in question, or whether the other witness' watch, if he had one, was rather fast or inaccurate we care not; nor do we care whether Zawar Husen went to Bharwari by train or on horse-back, for we are absolutely certain that he was present sometime between midnight and 2 o'clock on the following morning and was taking part in the attack on Imdad Husen.

Mr. Boys complains that the course adopted by the prosecution in the Court of Session prejudiced his client. Mr. Boys was anxious to show, apparently, in the Court of Session that Zawar Husen could not have travelled by train from Allahabad to Bharwari that night. Some one or more of the witnesses who had been called before the Magistrate were not called in the Court of Session. Mr. Boys, who was defending Zawar Husen in the Court of Session, called one of those witnesses, with the object, apparently, of getting the witness to say that in the Magistrate's Court he had sworn that he had seen Zawar Husen at or near Bharwari Railway Station that night. However, Mr. Boys called this witness, and thereby made him a witness for the defence. He proceeded to examine him, not by asking him what he knew about the case, but by asking him what he had said in the [157] Magistrate's Court. Neither counsel for an accused person nor his client is entitled to cross-examine a witness called for the accused person, unless it appears that that witness is suppressing the truth or is lying or is refusing to give information. Mr. Boys was not entitled at that stage to ask the witness what he had said in the Magistrate's Court. That, at that point, was immaterial. Mr. Boys was entitled to ask the witness as to what he could state of his own knowledge as to the events of that night, and if the witness in giving his evidence showed a hostile spirit in obviously suppressing information or in giving evidence at variance with what he had stated before, then Mr. Boys would have been entitled to ask the Court for permission to cross-examine his own witness. He was not entitled to begin his examination by a question which could only be put in cross-examination. He had laid no foundation for any right to cross-examine that particular witness. Further, Mr. Boys might have found himself in this difficulty, if the evidence had been admitted—we are glad to say the Judge rejected the question—that, having called a witness who was not shown to be hostile or suppressing evidence or contradicting what he had already stated, Mr. Boys' client would have been bound by the man's answers and would not have been entitled to call evidence to contradict him. There might have been some difficulty in getting in the evidence of Muhammad Mehdi, if he was only tendered after the evidence to which we have been alluding had been given, if the question had been allowed.

But, indeed, the point was a small one. In our opinion it was immaterial whether the particular witness had or had not seen Zawar Husen at or near Bharwari Railway Station. The real question was—did Zawar Husen take part in the attack upon Imdad Husen? In this country it cannot be assumed that either a criminal or a civil case is false because a witness has lied or has exaggerated. We are satisfied on the evidence in this case beyond any doubt that Zawar Husen, Miru and Phullu did attack Imdad Husen, for the purpose and with the intention of killing him, sometime between midnight and 2 A.M. on the night in [158] question. We say 2 A.M. because the first report was made at the thana at 2-30 A.M. There was moon-light. These men were known perfectly well to the witnesses by sight; they lived in the same village. Zawar Husen's identity was also further established by witnesses hearing his voice. It is fortunate for these appellants that they did not succeed in their object that night. This was a planned and deliberate attempt at murder. The sentence of transportation for life passed on these men was the proper sentence. We dismiss these appeals.

Act No. VIII of 1897 (Reformatory Schools Act), ss. 4, 8 and 16—Order for detention in a Reformatory School under s. 8—Revision—Powers of High Court.

[Overruled, 21 A. 331 (F.B.); Diss., L.B.R. (1893–1900) 441.]

THIS was an application for revision made by the Government Advocate in respect of an order of the Joint Magistrate of Jaunpur. The Joint Magistrate convicted five persons, including Himai, of the offence punishable under s. 411 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced them therefor to various terms imprisonment. As to Himai the Magistrate recorded:—"Himai is a boy of fifteen years and shall be sent to the Reformatory for three years in place of going to prison for one year."

Revision of this order was applied for on the ground that Himai, being fifteen years of age, could not be the subject of an order under s. 8 of Act No. VIII of 1897.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—Himai was convicted of the offence punishable under s. 411 of the Indian Penal Code and was sentenced to one year's rigorous imprisonment therefor. [159] The Magistrate, purporting to act under s. 8 of Act No. VIII of 1897, substituted for that order of imprisonment an order for detention in a Reformatory School. The Magistrate found that Himai was fifteen years of age. Consequently Himai was not a "youthful offender" within the meaning of s. 4 of Act No. VIII of 1897 at the time of his conviction. The order substituting detention in a Reformatory School for imprisonment was therefore illegal.

But s. 16 of Act No. VIII of 1897*, precludes this Court from interfering in appeal or revision with an order for detention in a Reformatory School passed in substitution for an order of transportation or imprisonment. We can put no other construction upon s. 16. We accordingly dismiss this application for revision.

Dalera and twelve years of age. Daleras are excluded from the purview of Act No. VIII of 1897 in these Provinces under rules made on the 18th of June 1897, by the Local Government. Consequently the order for substitution was illegal. It was further illegal in that it transgressed the rule which regulates the period for which a youthful offender of that age might be sent to a Reformatory School. Under s. 16 of Act No. VIII of 1897, this Court is precluded from altering or reversing that order, as the order was an order for detention in a Reformatory School in substitution for an order of imprisonment. Consequently, even if Gobinda had been a youthful offender who was not excluded from the operation of the Act by the rules made by the Local Government, we could not interfere with that portion of the order which directed him to be detained in a Reformatory School for four years. Act No. VIII of 1897 (Reformatory Schools Act), ss. 8 and 16—Order for detention in a Reformatory School under s. 8—Revision—Powers of High Court.

The prohibition contained in s. 16 of Act No. VIII of 1897, does not apply to an order for detention in a Reformatory School passed when the person to whom it relates has not been convicted of any offence and has not been sentenced to any term of imprisonment or transportation for which detention in a reformatory could be substituted.

THIS was an application for revision made by the Government Advocate in respect of an order of the District Magistrate of Gorakhpur.

On inquiring into a charge under s. 457 read with s. 75 of the Indian Penal Code, the Joint Magistrate of Gorakhpur had recorded the following order:—"I should have dealt with the case myself, but accused was convicted of an [161] offence under s. 454 of the Indian Penal Code in January this year. He is aged about 10. Sarju says his parents are badly off, and I do not think it would be any use binding him over to be of good behaviour. I consider he should be sent to a Reformatory. As I have not been empowered to pass such an order under s. 8 of Act No. VIII of 1897, I forward the case with this opinion to the District Magistrate under s. 9 of the said Act."

The District Magistrate, without noticing that the accused had not been convicted and sentenced by the Joint Magistrate, passed an order that the accused be confined in a Reformatory for six years.

Revision of this order was applied for on the grounds that the accused could not be sent to a Reformatory without first having been convicted of the offence with which he was charged, and, secondly, that the age of the accused had not been definitely ascertained.

The Government Advocate (Mr. E. Chamier), for the Crown.

convicted Billar of any offence, and of course without having sentenced him, the Magistrate sent the case to the Magistrate of the District. The Magistrate of the District, omitting to notice that Billar had not been convicted and had not been sentenced, and that he had no jurisdiction to make an order for detention in a Reformatory School in his case, ordered that Billar should be detained in a Reformatory School for six years. That order was entirely illegal. There was no jurisdiction to make it. It was not an order for detention in a Reformatory School passed in substitution for an order for transportation or imprisonment; consequently this Court is not precluded by s. 16 of Act No. VIII of 1897, from dealing with the order of the Magistrate of the District. We set aside the order of the Magistrate of the District, and direct that the Magistrate of the District, or some other competent Magistrate to whom the case may be assigned by him, shall proceed with the investigation of the charge according to law.

It is admitted that Rai Sham Krishna was not appointed by any Court guardian of the minor co-plaintiffs, and that there was a person, namely, their mother, who was appointed guardian by a competent Court. No objection was taken in the written statement to the frame of the suit, and the suit proceeded to its first hearing on the 15th of September 1893, when issues were fixed in which no question was raised for decision as to the [163] parties who were arrayed as plaintiffs whether they were or were not properly represented as plaintiffs in the suit. In the face of these facts it is somewhat difficult to understand the opening sentence in the judgment of the Court below, which sets out that the defendants had taken a preliminary objection to the effect that Rai Sham Krishna could not be the next friend of the plaintiffs, numbers two and three, as there was a certificated guardian of the minors, and that the suit failed for non-joinder of parties. This objection could only have been taken orally, and there is no trace of its having been taken till the 15th of November 1895, in other words, till nearly three years had elapsed from the time when the suit was instituted and after the case had been fixed for some score of hearings. The Court below proceeded, however, to treat the objection as a very serious one. It held, under the authority of s. 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that Rai Sham Krishna could not institute the suit on behalf of the minor co-plaintiffs; that the only person who could institute a suit on their behalf was the guardian appointed by the Court, and that, as the minors were necessary plaintiffs in the case, the suit as instituted was ab initio void, failed and must be dismissed. For this view, it further relied upon the case of Har Bilas v. Lachman Das (1). As regards the case of Har Bilas v. Lachman Das, we are of opinion that we need not consider it any further, as the case was decided before the passing of Act No. VIII of 1890, and that Act has made the law, in our opinion, sufficiently clear for us to follow without any regard to the cases decided before it was passed. Section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended by Act No. VIII of 1890, provides, first, that every suit by a minor shall be instituted in his name by an adult person, and, secondly, that if a minor has a guardian appointed or declared by an authority competent in this behalf, such suit shall not be instituted on behalf of the minor by any person other than such guardian, except with the leave of the Court obtained in the way provided [164] by that section. In this suit, as it stands at present, we have the fact that the guardian appointed by an authority competent in that behalf has not instituted the suit on behalf of the two minor plaintiffs, and that no application has up to now been made to bring her as guardian upon the record. We have the further fact that Rai Sham Krishna, who posed as guardian, has never obtained the leave of the Court to sue on behalf of his minor brothers. The learned counsel for the appellants attempted to meet this difficulty that was raised in his way by first contending that the mother of the minor co-plaintiffs had not been declared guardian by a competent authority. This contention was based upon the argument that we had before us the case of a joint Hindu family living jointly, the karta of which family was the plaintiff Rai Sham Krishna, that as such karta he was competent to manage and to institute suits respecting the joint family property, and that no need existed for the appointment of any guardian to the minors. In fact, his contention went so far as to maintain that Act No. VIII of 1890 did not apply to the case of a joint Hindu family living jointly. It is not necessary to decide that question in the present case. We have the fact that a Court having jurisdiction to appoint a guardian for the minors has appointed as guardian the mother of the minors. In such a case we hold that s. 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure precludes any other person than the guardian so appointed from instituting a suit on behalf of the minors, except in the case pointed out in s. 440, i.e., when, after due notice has been given to such guardian and after hearing and objection which such guardian may desire to make with respect to the institution of the suit, the leave of the Court has been granted to another person to institute the suit on behalf of such minors. This being so, we so far agree with the Court below that the suit was not properly instituted on behalf of the minor plaintiffs. This did not, however, entail the dismissal of the suit as brought. There was from the beginning before the Court one plaintiff who was sui juris, and further no [165] objection was taken to the effect that the remaining plaintiffs were not properly represented. If the respondent wished to raise the objection that the minors were necessary parties to the suit, and that, inasmuch as they were not properly represented, they could not be considered to have been joined as parties, that objection as to non-joinder had by law to be taken at the earliest opportunity, and in any case before the first hearing. Section 34 expressly provides that any such objection not so taken shall be deemed to have been waived by the defendant. In this case, as we have already pointed out, the objection as to non-joinder of the plaintiffs was not taken until two years had elapsed from the date of the first hearing. The Court below was therefore not justified in dismissing the suit on the ground of non-joinder. While the case was slowly proceeding, one of the minor co-plaintiffs came of age and asked the lower Court to be permitted to proceed with the case, but permission was refused, and wrongly refused. The Court should have done what we now direct to be done in this case, and that is that the title of the suit be correct and read henceforth, so far as that plaintiff is concerned, as "Rai Butte Krishna, late a minor but now of full age." This correction, which should have been made, would have cured the defect of non-joinder so far as Rai Butte Krishna was concerned. In the view we have taken it is immaterial whether the third plaintiff was properly represented or not. The case must, however, go back, and the Court will now have an opportunity of doing that which it should have done at a much earlier stage of the proceedings, namely, of allowing the third plaintiff to be properly represented, and this it can do by following the procedure laid down in s. 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The view we have just taken is, we find, similar to that adopted by the Calcutta High Court in the case of Beni Ram Bhutt v. Ram Lal Dhukri (1).

We decree this appeal, and, as the Court below has gone wrong on a preliminary point, we set aside the decree of that Court and remand the case to the Court below with directions to re-admit it [166] under its original number on its file of pending cases and to proceed with it according to law. Costs here and hitherto will abide the event.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

Act No. XLV of 1860 (Indian Penal Code), s. 498—Enticing away a married woman—Evidence of marriage—Mere statement of the complainant and the woman insufficient.

Where a charge is made under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code of enticing away a married woman, the Court should require some better evidence of the marriage than the mere statement of the complainant and the woman.

THIS was a case referred by the Sessions Judge of Mainpuri to the High Court on an application for revision made by Dal Singh. Dal Singh had been convicted by a Deputy Magistrate of the offence punishable under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code, and sentenced to a fine of Rs. 25, or in default to four months' rigorous imprisonment. In his application in revision he contended that there was no sufficient evidence to prove the marriage between the woman he had been convicted of abducting and her alleged husband, the complainant. That evidence consisted of the statement of the woman, who was called as a witness before the Deputy Magistrate, and the statement of the complainant. In support of the application the case of Queen-Empress v. Kallu (1) was relied on.

The following order was passed by the High Court.

ORDER.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—In any view of this case the sentence was entirely inadequate. In one view, the case was merely one under s. 498 of the Indian Penal Code; but the woman, if she was the complainant's wife, was, if the evidence is true, enticed away by the accused, who had [167] connection with her and kept her for sometime. If her story is true, the accused man must in addition have committed the offence punishable under s. 376 of the Indian Penal Code. The case has not been properly tried. In cases of this kind, where a false charge may easily be made of enticing away a woman, said to be a married woman, but possibly only a mistress, the Court should require some better evidence of the marriage than the mere statement of the complainant and the woman. We set aside the conviction and sentence, and we direct that a further inquiry be held before some competent Magistrate of the district, other than Syed Mazhar Ali, who can either deal with the case himself, or, if he should be of opinion that a case under s. 376 is made out, will act accordingly.

Civil Procedure Code, s. 435—Company—Corporation—Unincorporated society—Form of suit.

The corporation contemplated by the Code of Civil Procedure is a corporation as known in English Law, that is, a corporation created with the express consent of the Sovereign, or of such antiquity that the consent of the Sovereign may be presumed.

In a suit by an unregistered and unincorporated society the names of the members of the company must be disclosed. If this is not done, and if the society is neither a corporation nor a company authorized to sue or be sued in the name of an officer or of a trustee, so as to make the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, s. 435, applicable, the plaint is a bad plaint. Koylash [168] Chandra Roy v Ellis (1), *The Muhammadan Association of Meerut v. THE facts of this case are sufficiently stated in the judgment of the Court.

JUDGMENT.

BANERJI and AIKMAN, JJ.—This was a suit for sale brought upon a mortgage, dated the 18th of July 1889, by the plaintiffs-appellants who described themselves in the plaint as follows:—"Panchaiti Akhara Kalan Udasi Sri Sat Guru Nanak Nirwan Panch Parmeshwar, in Kydganj, city Allahabad, through Mahant Moti Ram, Mokami Hari Das, Mahant Narain Das, Mahant Soti Prakas, Mahant Gokul Das, Mahants Ganga Ram and Iswar Das, Local Agents and Managers of the said Akhara." It was stated in the plaint that the loan had been taken from, and the mortgage granted to, "The Panchaiti Akhara Kalan Udasi in muhalla Kydganj in the city of Allahabad, under the management of the plaintiffs." The defendants did not appear at the hearing. The Court of first instance, however, relying upon the ruling of this Court in Yusuf Beg v. The Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church of New York (3) dismissed the suit. It was of opinion that the "Akhara Panchaiti" was not a corporation, and had no "legal status" to sue. This decree was affirmed by the Court of first appeal.

It was contended in this second appeal that the Akhara Panchaiti was a corporation by prescription and entitled to sue in its corporate name. Having regard to the importance of the question raised, and to the fact that the decision of it will affect a large number of religious associations similar to that of the plaintiffs, which, we understand, have hitherto sued and been sued in the manner in which the plaintiffs have brought this suit, we took time to consider our judgment. After giving the question our best consideration, we have come to the conclusion that the [169] plaintiffs are not a corporation within the meaning of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The Akhara Panchaiti is, according to the finding of the Lower Appellate Court, an association "formed by the followers of Guru Nanak, who flourished in the 15th century. Certain of his followers are stationary. They carry on money dealings and acquire immoveable property and distribute food and clothing to other followers of Guru Nanak who wander over the country, or they otherwise dispose of their income in charity." Such an association might be a corporation under the Civil Law, but is not a corporation under the English Law.

"Corporations, by the Civil Law seem to have been created by the mere act and voluntary association of their members; provided such convention was not contrary to law, for then it was illicitum collegium. It does not appear that the prince's consent was necessary to be actually given to the foundation of them." (Stephen's Commentaries on the Laws of England, Vol. III, p. 8, 8th Edition.) In England, however, "the Sovereign's consent is absolutely necessary to the erection of any corporation, either impliedly or expressly given (ib. p. 8)." Such consent is presumed in the case of corporations by prescription, that is, corporations "which have existed as corporations from a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and therefore are looked upon in law to be well created. For though the members thereof can show no legal charter of incorporation, yet in cases of such high antiquity, the law presumes there once was one, and that by the variety of accidents which a length of time may produce the charter is lost or destroyed (ib. p. 8)." In our opinion the corporation contemplated by the Code of Civil Procedure is a corporation as known in English law, that is, a corporation created with the express consent of the Sovereign or of such antiquity that the consent of the Sovereign may be presumed. It is not alleged that the Akhara Panchaiti was founded with the sanction of the ruling authority, and the learned advocate for the appellants has frankly admitted that he is unable to trace the [170] origin of the plaintiffs' association to royal sanction. Further, the antiquity of the association is not in our opinion such as to make it a corporation by prescription. As the plaintiff's society is neither a corporation, nor has it got itself registered so as to make it "a company authorized to sue and be sued in the name of an officer or of a trustee," we are constrained to hold that the suit has been rightly dismissed.

The decision of Peacock, C. J., in Koylash Chandra Roy v. Ellis (1) is an authority for holding that in a suit by an unregistered or unincorporated company, the names of the members of the company must be disclosed. If this is not done, and if the society is neither "a corporation, nor a company authorized to sue or be sued in the name of an officer or of a trustee," so as to make the provisions of s. 435 of the Code of Civil Procedure applicable, the plaint is a bad one. As remarked in Stephen's Commentaries (Vol. III, p. 17, 8th Edition), the rights and privileges of a corporation "do not attach to any bodies of persons unincorporated, however connected they may be in point of social position, or however united by express compact; though a voluntary society of individuals should unite together by mutual agreement for common purposes; should provide a common stock by subscription, and should subject themselves to laws of their own creation for the Government of their society, yet all this will not entitle them to the privilege of suing or being sued in their social capacity."

As observed in the case relied on by the lower Court—Yusuf Beg v. The Board of Foreign Missions, &c. (1), bodies of this nature wishing to claim the privileges and protection which the law assigns to corporations "should take care to have themselves incorporated and registered in such a way that those who deal with them or are brought in contact with them can know whom they are suing and by whom they are sued."

We would also refer to the case, The Muhammadan Association of Meerut v. Bakshi Ram (2).

[171] As was held in that case, so it must be held here, that the plaintiff society has per se no status in law to warrant its instituting a suit in its own name by some of its members. As the suit was brought in the name of the society itself, and does not purport to be a suit brought by some out of numerous persons having the same interest, s. 30 of the Code of Civil Procedure has no application. We may add that in this case permission to sue was not applied for under that section.

For the above reasons we hold that the appeal fails, and we dismiss it, but without costs, as the respondents are not represented.

Appeal dismissed.

Construction of a contract in a mortgage deed as to interest. Also the absence of requirement to register, under s. 17 of Act, No. III of 1877, petitions filed in judicial proceedings.

A deed of mortgage stipulated in general terms that interest was to run upon the principal sums advanced, without any limitation as to the period of its currency; and also stipulated that, in default of punctual payment at the end of each year, the mortgagees were to be at liberty to treat unpaid interest as principal, and to recover it from the mortgaged property. According to the tenor of the deed, when all its provisions and conditions were considered, it was not the true construction that the capital sum was to cease to bear interest at the contract rate upon the arrival of the time stipulated for payment.

Mathura Das v. Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal (3) referred to and followed. Section 17 of the Registration Act III of 1877 does not apply to proper judicial proceedings whether consisting of pleadings filed by the parties, or orders made by the Court.

CROSS appeals from two decrees (9th March 1893) of the High Court, varying a decree (30th June 1888) of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur.

[172] These appeals were consolidated by an order in Council of the 9th March 1893. The plaintiffs were mahajans in Gorakhpur. The defendants were Bharan Naik, deceased during the proceedings in the suit, and his son Bindesri Naik. The claim was brought upon two deeds mortgaging a village, and shares in pattidari villages; the first deed dated the 21st August 1875, securing a loan of Rs. 8,977 to be re-paid in two years, with interest at Rs. 1-8-0 a month, and the second, dated the 3rd May 1876 securing Rs. 2,977 to be re-paid on the date when the first loan would become due, at the same rate of interest. Both mortgages were by conditional sale, and the provisions in the first deed were made applicable to the mortgage in the second. All the particulars are set forth in their Lordships' judgment.

The principal question determined on this appeal related to the construction of the contract for the payment of interest, and to whether it was payable at the contract rate after the day, fixed for payment originally, had passed. Another question (the answer to which had been the ground of decision in the High Courts) was whether petitions for further time filed by the mortgagors during proceedings commenced for foreclosure should have been registered in order to be admissible in evidence in this suit, according to s. 17 of the Registration Act, 1877.

On the 18th January 1879 the mortgagees applied, under s. 8 of Regulation XVII of 1806, for foreclosure, stating in this petition that the unpaid debt was Rs. 21,646. The prescribed procedure, however, was not followed up. Afterwards the mortgagees petitioned for a deduction of Rs. 7,452 from their claim.

On the following dates, viz., 3rd September 1879, 4th December 1879, 5th April 1881, 23rd May 1882, 15th April 1884 and 15th May 1886, petitions were presented to the same Court containing agreements between the parties, by which, in consideration of the amounts for which foreclosure might be obtained, the amounts being agreed upon in each petition, the period of the loan was, from time to time, extended. Interest due, but unpaid, [173] was at those intervals added to the principal, the whole carrying interest at the rate stipulated by the deeds. The last petition stated it to be agreed that Rs. 33,444 were then due for principal and interest together and that the mortgagor should be liable for that sum with interest thereon at the rate of Rs. 1-8-0 a month upon having time granted to him by the mortgagees; that time was three months more; at the end whereof upon default in payment of principal and interest, the mortgagors, by taking proper steps, should become the proprietors of the land mortgaged.

Default made was followed by this suit claiming Rs. 43,450, commenced on the 12th December 1887.

The following were the principal issues:—Whether the mortgage had or had not been foreclosed; whether the whole of the mortgage debt had been satisfied; whether the interest had been properly calculated.

Both the Courts below found that the foreclosure proceedings had had no result, and that principal and interest were still unliquidated. But the Court of first instance treated the admissions made in the petitions for further time as the result of advantage taken of the helpless state of the debtors, and decreed only Rs. 24,900 to be due.

On appeals by both parties a division Bench of the High Court referred to the petitions for time, taking the sum stated in the last as agreed upon. They gave the following reasons:—

"The plaintiffs' contention here is that that sum of Rs. 33,444-7-6 should be taken as the principal due. Under the bond of the 21st of August 1875 it was agreed that when interest was in default the mortgagees should be entitled to add such interest to the principal and treat it as principal. The conditions of the first bond were by the second bond made applicable to the latter. Now, although the bonds do not appear to contemplate the payment of post diem interest, and although the greater part of that sum of Rs. 33,444-7-6 must have been composed of post diem interest, it was in our opinion competent to the parties to agree on the one side that [174] the period when foreclosure should be finally applied for should be extended, and on the other, in consideration of such extension of time, that the original principal amounts should be increased by adding to them interest at the rate stipulated in the bond, treating such interest as principal secured by the bond, and by agreeing that interest on such amount should be paid at such time as they might arrange. On the part of the defendants it was contended here that as the petitions, including that of the 15th May 1886, to which we have referred, were not registered, they could not be considered, or given effect to, in this suit. We do not agree with that contention. The proceedings instituted on the 18th January 1879, were before the Court in which those proceedings were instituted, and it was quite competent to the parties to those proceedings from time to time to present petitions, stating accounts upon the basis of which the Court might act without there being any necessity for those petitions being registered. The Indian Registration Act never could have been intended to make it obligatory upon parties to a proceeding pending in a Civil Court to register statements of accounts agreed upon for the Court's guidance, although those statements of accounts related to charges upon immoveable property. In our opinion those petitions may be looked at and effect given them. If the mortgagees had not on the basis of the agreements contained in those petitions granted time, they would have been entitled to recover by foreclosure or other proceedings the principal and interest stipulated in the mortgage contract and damages in the nature of interest for the non-payment of the principal amount on the due date. Here the mortgagors having from time to time obtained extension of time by agreeing to statements as to the amount due, seek to deprive the mortgagees of the consideration upon which the time was so extended, and to confine them to such rights as, having regard to limitation, they would be entitled to on the two mortgage contracts standing by themselves. That was not the intention of the parties at the time. The Subordinate [175] Judge did not take the Rs. 33,444-7-6 as the basis upon which to calculate the amount of the decree. He was of opinion that the mortgagors were helpless, and that the mortgagees took undue advantage of their helplessness, and that as a Court of equity he ought to interfere. No evidence has been brought to our attention to suggest that any undue advantage was taken.

"On the one side the mortgagees were, in 1879, taking proceedings authorized by Regulation XVII of 1806, to obtain foreclosure; and on the other side the mortgagors were desirous of obtaining time. What was done was that time was given on the basis of interest continuing to be payable at the rate mentioned in the bonds, and that such interest

"should be added to the principal. In our opinion the Subordinate Judge was not justified in concluding that there had been any undue advantage taken by the mortgagees. In our opinion we shall be giving effect to the arrangement between the parties by making a decree under s. 86 of the Transfer of Property Act, and fixing the amount at Rs. 33,444-7-6 with interest thereon at the rate of Rs. 1-8-0 per mensem for three months, from the 15th May 1886, and including in the amount on payment of which redemption will be obtained, the plaintiffs' proportionate costs on the amount decreed by us. The defendants will have time to pay the decretal amount within six months from the date of declaring the amount of the account to be taken in this office. The decree will be prepared under s. 86 of the Transfer of Property Act. In preparing the account the proportionate costs in this Court and the Court below of the defendants in respect of that portion of the claim disallowed by us will be deducted from the amount payable by the defendants. The above principle will be applied to the appeal. To the above extent the plaintiffs' appeal is allowed with proportionate costs, and the defendants' is dismissed with costs."

On this appeal.

[176] Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the appellants argued that the petitions filed in the foreclosure proceedings, representing transactions between the parties affecting immovable property, were within s. 17 of the Registration Act III of 1877. The agreement stated in the petitions being treated as apart from the evidence, the ground of decision in the High Court's judgment was insufficient.

Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the respondents. The petitions in judicial proceedings required no registration. Any argument on the construction of the contract to pay interest, that it ceased on the day fixed for repayment of the loan to be claimable at the rate fixed, was precluded by the decision in Mathura Dass v. Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal (1), which disaffirmed the judgment on this point in Narindar Bahadur Pal Khadim Husain (2).

Afterwards, on the 8th December 1897, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by LORD WATSON :—The late Bhairon Naik, and his son and heir Bindesri Naik, who is the present appellant, on the 21st August 1875, executed a mortgage, in the form of a conditional sale, in favour of the deceased Debi Prasad, who is now represented by the respondents Ganga Saran Sahu and Ram Saran Sahu, and of the other respondent Goshain Moti Gir. By the terms of that deed, the mortgagors acknowledged "that the sum borrowed is Rs. 8,997 in cash of the current coin; that interest shall be paid "on this sum at Rs. 1-8-0 per cent. per mensem": and that they had, in lieu thereof, given a conditional mortgage of the entire village of Ramnagra, and of certain other shares of lands (which need not be enumerated) "for a term of two years from this day, engaging to redeem the mortgaged shares by paying the entire amount in a single sum within or at the time stipulated." The deed provided that, if they should fail to pay the principal money at the time stipulated, the mortgage of the shares should [177] in lieu of that money only be foreclosed; and they should every year pay the interest; and that on default of payment of interest at the end of the year, "the creditors shall be at liberty to treat it as principal,

(2) 17 A. 581.

"and to recover it with interest thereon from our person and our other property, and also from the property mortgaged."

By a second deed of mortgage by conditional sale, dated the 3rd May 1876, which recites the previous deed of the 21st August 1875, the appellant and his father borrowed from the same lenders "another sum of Rs. 2,997 of the current coin, engaging to pay interest thereon at Rs. 1-8-0 per cent. per mensem; that we tack this money on to the conditions of the former deed of mortgage by conditional sale, engaging to pay it with the amount of the said former deed; that on default of payment of the amount of the former deed or of this one, according to the terms of the former deed, the mortgage of the said shares shall, in lieu of the amount of both deeds, be foreclosed, and the sale shall become absolute."

The time of payment stipulated in the first deed, which was made applicable to both, arrived on the 21st August 1877. No payment having been made, the creditors, on the 18th January 1879, presented an application in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur, praying that at first the usual process of allowing one year's time should be issued to the mortgagors, and that, if they failed to deposit Rs. 21,066-11-3, the amount of principal and interest then claimed as due, together with future interest and costs of foreclosure, an order might be passed declaring the mortgage to be foreclosed. The record bears, under the signature of the Judge, that the application was admitted by the present appellant and his father.

On the 3rd September 1879, the creditors filed an application stating that they had received two sums, together amounting to Rs. 7,452, from two persons, one of whom had purchased the entire village Ramnagra, and the other the 8-anna share of Mauza Tina from the mortgagors. They accordingly prayed [178] that Rs. 7,452 should be deducted from the sum claimed in their original application; that the village Ramnagra and the 8-anna share of Mauza Tina should be exempted from foreclosure; and that the remaining property of the mortgagors should be held liable to foreclosure for the balance of the amount originally claimed by them. The assent of the mortgagors to the application is attested by the signature of the Judge.

After the expiry of the year of grace allowed them for consignment or payment, the mortgagors, between the 4th December 1879 and the 15th May 1886, from time to time presented no less than five incidental petitions to the Court praying for further time. These petitions were, with consent of the creditors applying for foreclosure, confirmed by the Court, and directed to be filed with the foreclosure record. In each of these applications the mortgagors stated the total amount of principal and interest which, at its date, was owing by them under the two mortgage deeds, after deducting the sums paid to account by their vendees. The sum thus stated by them in their last application, on the 15th May 1886, was Rs. 33,444-7-6. Upon that occasion, by consent of the creditors, they obtained an extension of time for three months; but they failed, as usual, either to consign or pay within the time allowed them.

On the 12th December 1887, the creditors filed their plaint in this suit, praying either to have possession on the footing that the prior proceedings had effected a complete foreclosure, or to have the usual foreclosure decree. They claimed that the sum due to them was Rs. 43,450-11-6. In answer, the mortgagors filed a written statement in which they for the first time maintained that the mortgage deeds did not cover interest, at all events beyond the stipulated term of payment, being the 21st August 1877. They did not dispute that, in their repeated applications which have been already referred to, they had constantly admitted and asserted that, under the deeds in question, they were not entitled to redeem, except upon payment of the principal sums, with interest thereon at Rs. 18 per cent. per annum until [179] paid; and that in respect of such admission and assertion they had got an extension of time with the consent of their creditors. But they contended that none of these proceedings in the Subordinate Court of Gorakhpur could be referred to or founded upon, because they had not been registered in terms of s. 17 of Act III of 1877.

It does not clearly appear whether the Subordinate Judge was of opinion that interest was due under the mortgage deeds, and must be paid in order to avoid foreclosure. Had he been of that opinion, it would have been unnecessary for him to consider the effect of the statements and admissions previously made by the mortgagors in order to obtain delay. He held that registration of such proceedings was not compulsory, and that these admissions must receive effect; but, being of opinion that the creditors had taken an undue advantage of the mortgagors' helplessness, he, upon grounds which he describes as equitable, found that the creditors were only entitled to simple interest, and allowed the mortgagors to redeem on payment of Rs. 24,990-15-0, within six months.

Both parties appealed against that judgment to the High Court at Allahabad. In disposing of the cross appeals, the Court, consisting of Sir John Edge, C. J., and Aikman, J., expressed an opinion that the mortgage bonds did not appear to contemplate the payment of interest post diem, that is, after the day upon which it was stipulated that the principal of the loans was to be repaid. But they held that the mortgagors, having, from time to time, obtained extensions of the term of payment, by admissions that interest was included in the amount due, could not confine their creditors to such rights as they would have had under the two mortgage contracts standing by themselves. They held that judicial proceedings did not require to be registered under Act III of 1877, s. 17; and also that the Subordinate Judge was not justified in finding that an undue advantage had been taken of the mortgagors. They accordingly increased the amount payable for redemption to Rs. 36,492-12-3, taking, as [180] the basis of their calculation, the sum of Rs. 33,444-7-6, which the mortgagors had admitted to be due on the 15th May 1886.

The only plea urged for the mortgagors in support of this appeal was that founded upon Act III of 1877, which had been rejected by both Courts below. Their Lordships do not think that, according to the tenor of the mortgage deeds, it was intended that the capital sums should cease to bear interest, upon the arrival of the time stipulated for their payment. The learned Judges in the Courts below appear to have fallen into the error, which was corrected by this Board in Mathura Das v. Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal (1), of confining their attention to a single passage, instead of taking into consideration the whole provisions of the deeds with respect to interest. In the present case, by the deed of the 21st August 1875, the whole conditions and provisions of which are made applicable to both loans, it is stipulated, in general terms, that interest at Rs. 18 per cent. per annum is to run upon the principal sums advanced, without any limitation as to the period of its currency. And it is also stipulated that, in default of punctual payment at the end of each year, the creditors are to be at liberty to treat interest as principal, and to recover it from the mortgaged property. It was therefore, in their Lordships' opinion, unnecessary for the creditors, respondents in this appeal, to rely upon the admissions made by the mortgagors in the course of the foreclosure proceedings.

Although, in the view which their Lordships take the question whether those proceedings can be founded on, without their having been registered in terms of the Act of 1877, does not necessarily arise in this appeal, they think it right to add that, having heard counsel fully upon the point, they are satisfied that the provisions of s. 17 of the Act do not apply to proper judicial proceedings, whether consisting of pleadings filed by the parties, or of orders made by the Court.

[181] Their Lordships will, for those reasons, humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the decrees appealed from, and to dismiss the consolidated appeals with costs.

Appeals dismissed.

QUEEN-EMPRESS v. FATEH BAHADUR.* [11th December, 1897.]

Criminal Procedure Code, s. 555—Jurisdiction—Appellate Court not disqualified by interest from granting permission to a subordinate Court to try a case.

The interest which might disqualify a Court from trying or committing for trial a case, having regard to s. 555 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, will not prevent an appellate Court from giving the permission contemplated by that section.

IN this case a complaint was lodged against one Fateh Bahadur, a clerk in the employment of the North-Western Provinces Club of the commission by him of an offence punishable under s. 409 of the Indian Penal Code in respect of moneys the property of the members of the Club. The complainant was the Honorary Secretary of the Club. The case came before the Cantonment Magistrate of Allahabad, who, being himself a member of the Club, referred it to the Sessions Judge under s. 555 of the Code of Criminal Procedure to obtain his permission to try it. The Sessions Judge was also a member of the Club, and held on this application that the prohibition contained in s. 555 inferentially applied to him also and disabled him from giving the permission asked for. He accordingly declined to grant permission to the Cantonment Magistrate to try the case. Against this order of the Sessions Judge the complainant applied in revision to the High Court.

The possession of a usufructuary mortgagee being the possession of all the persons who have the right of redemption, that is, of all the persons entitled to the estate, it is only when after redemption possession is taken by some of the persons so entitled that their possession can become adverse as against the others.

[183] In a suit for possession of immoveable property it is for the plaintiff to show by some prima facie evidence that he has a subsisting title not extinguished by the operation of limitation before the defendant can be called upon to substantiate a plea of adverse possession. *Parmanand Misr v. [184] The property in suit originally belonged to Karamat Ali, who died about fifty years ago, leaving him surviving his two sons and three daughters, who were heirs to his estate. The names of his sons alone, however, were entered in the revenue papers, and on the death of Altaf Ali the name of Hashmat Ali alone was recorded, although the right to his share devolved on his surviving brother and sisters. Upon Hashmat Ali's death the names of his sons and daughter, who are the first four defendants to the suit, were entered in respect of the whole property.

The first and second plaintiffs are the sons of Latif-un-nissa, and the third plaintiff is a daughter of Mubarak-un-nissa. The fourth plaintiff is the purchaser from the other plaintiffs of a portion of what is alleged to be their share of the estate of Karamat Ali and she is evidently financing the suit. The extent of the legal share of the first three plaintiffs is 35 sihams out of 140, i.e., one-fourth.

The plaintiffs allege that they have all along been in possession of their share jointly with the other heirs of Karamat Ali, but the first four defendants now dispute their title. The plaintiffs therefore brought this suit for establishment of their right to a fourth share, for possession of that share and for partition of certain houses.

The main defence to the suit was that of limitation. The lower Court has allowed it and has dismissed the claim.

As regards a portion of the property claimed, namely, the resumed muafi lands in kasba Khurja, the plea of limitation cannot prevail. Those lands were mortgaged by the ancestor and were in the possession of the mortgagee. The mortgage having been discharged out of the usufruct, it was redeemed by the defendants Nos. 1 to 4 in 1888, when they took possession. The possession of the mortgagee was the possession of all the persons who had the right of redemption, that is, of the persons entitled to the estate. It was only when, after redemption, possession was taken by the first four defendants that their possession became adverse to the plaintiffs. As the suit was brought within twelve [185] years from the date of the defendant's possession, it was, as regards this part of the claim, within time. The Court below has evidently erred in dismissing this portion of the claim as barred by limitation. There is no question as to the title of the plaintiffs and the extent of their share. So far as the muafi lands are concerned their title has not become extinct by lapse of time, and they are entitled to a decree.

With regard to the remainder of the property, it is contended that the suit is governed by art. 144 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877, and that the burden of proof was on the defendants to establish the adverse possession alleged by them. In our opinion in every suit for possession, the plaintiff must prove not only a legal title to possession, but a subsisting title not barred by the law of limitation. The effect of that law is not only to bar the remedy on the expiry of the prescribed period of limitation, but to extinguish the right (vide s. 28 of Act No. XV of 1877). It is therefore for the plaintiff to show by some prima facie evidence that he has a subsisting title not extinguished by the operation of limitation before the defendant can be called upon to substantiate his plea of adverse possession. This was held by this Court in Parmanand Misr v. Sahib Ali (1) and Jafar Husain v. Mashuq Ali (2).

The quantum of evidence which it will be necessary for the plaintiff to adduce will depend on the circumstances of each case. In some instances very slight evidence may be sufficient to shift the burden of proof on the defendant. We agree with the observation of the learned Judges in Fazal Karim v. Umda Bibi (3), that in dealing with question of possession as between brothers and sisters in native families regard must be had "to the conditions of life under which such families live" and to the fact that in such families the management of the property of the family is, by reason of the seclusion of the female members, ordinarily left in the hands of the male members. [186] In the case of such families slight evidence of enjoyment of income arising from the property is sufficient prima facie proof of possession. In the suit before us the evidence adduced by the plaintiff hardly amounts to such proof.

[The rest of the judgment in this case deals mainly with the evidence in the case and therefore is not reported—ED.]

THIS was a reference under section 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure made to the High Court by the Officiating District Judge of Saharanpur on an application for revision of an order passed by the Joint Magistrate.

The facts of the case are thus stated in the referring order :— " The applicant is a resident of the district of Farrukhabad, and is the sole proprietor of a Company carrying goods and passengers between Saharanpur and Rajpur. He carries on business under the style of Lalta Prasad & Co. The local manager of the business is Lalta Prasad's nephew Janki Das. It is admitted that he has complete control of the management, and that he has various other local managers, clerks and drivers under him. Applicant was prosecuted under s. 6 (1), of Act XI of 1890 (The Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act), and fined Rs. 100, for permitting to be driven in a tonga a horse which was suffering from severe harness galls and excessive weakness. The only point taken by Mr. Vansittart for petitioner is that Lalta Prasad cannot be said to have 'permitted' the unlawful use of the animal. It is admitted that Lalta Prasad is a respectable man, that he usually resides at [187] Farrukhabad and rarely comes here, and that he was at Farrukhabad when the alleged cruelty was committed."

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR, J.—This is a case which has been submitted to this Court under s. 438 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, with the recommendation that the order of conviction should be quashed. The person convicted is unquestionably a resident of Farrukhabad. He made it his business to let out horses and ponies on hire, and a certain pony, his property, was being used, and cruelly used, on the high road between Saharanpur and Rajpur. The driver who committed the ill-usage was his servant; the nature of the ill-usage was this, that the pony was driven when it was, through collar galls, quite unfit to be so driven. The question is whether the owner "permitted" such illegal employment of the animal. The word "permit" has a well known meaning, and, unless under very exceptional circumstances, implies knowledge of that which is permitted. Such knowledge, it is not suggested, was in the possession of the owner of the pony. Mr. Chamier has been instructed to call my attention to two cases in the English Reports, in which a larger meaning has been given to the word "permit" than that which it bears in common parlance. One case is reported in 13 Law Journal, C. P., page 319; the other is reported in Law Reports 12 Q. B., page 639. In one case the person convicted was the owner of a licensed Music Hall. The other was a case of a Railway Company. I do not think the special circumstances existing in those cases have any parallel in this, and I am not aware of any case arising in an Indian Court in which the word "permit" has been interpreted, in a quasi-criminal case, in any meaning more extensive than that which it obtains in common parlance. No doubt the decision of this case adversely to the conviction will [188] materially limit the usefulness of the Act.

TIKAM SINGH AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. THAKUR KISHORE
RAMANJI MAHARAJ, THROUGH SHEO GOPAL AND OTHERS
(Plaintiffs).^{*} [22nd December, 1897.]

Civil Procedure Code, ss. 32 and 108—Powers conferred by s. 32 exerciseable even after an order has been passed under s. 108.

Held that the powers conferred by s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure in respect of the addition of parties were exerciseable even after a suit had been reinstated on an application under s. 108 of the Code made by one of the defendants who had not been served with notice of the suit.

IN this case a suit for sale under the Transfer of Property Act was brought by the trustees of a certain temple against Magan Behari Lal, Tikam Singh his son, and other defendants. In that suit a decree for sale was made. Subsequently Tikam Singh, who had not been served with notice of the suit, applied under s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the decree set aside as against him, and it was accordingly set aside. After the suit as against Tikam Singh had been reinstated on the file of pending suits, the plaintiffs made an application under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure praying that a minor brother of Tikam Singh, and Tikam Singh's two minor sons should be brought upon the record as defendants, they being all members of the same joint Hindu family and parties interested within the meaning of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act. This application was granted and the names of the minors were put on the record of the suit. Against this order Tikam Singh appealed to the High Court.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—A suit for sale under the Transfer of Property Act was brought against Tikam Singh and others. A decree for sale was made. Subsequently Tikam, who had not been served with notice of the suit, presented an application under s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the decree set aside as against him, and it was accordingly set aside. Thereupon the plaintiffs applied to have Tikam's minor brother and his two minor sons brought on under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure as defendants, they being all members of a joint Hindu family and parties interested within the meaning of s. 85 of the Transfer of Property Act. The Court made an order bringing the minors on the record. From that order this appeal has been brought. It appears to us, that, as the suit was still at hearing before the Court of first instance, so far as the plaintiffs and Tikam Singh were concerned, the Court could exercise its discretion under s. 32 of the Code and add these defendants. We cannot say that the Court exercised its discretion wrongly. Such a case as this can but seldom occur, but in similar cases a Court should be cautious in making an order under s. 32 of the Code of Civil Procedure. (Opposite Party).* [23rd December, 1897.]

Act No. V of 1881 (Probate and Administration Act), s. 9—Application for probate by an executor.

Although under s. 85 of the Probate and Administration Act, 1881, it is within the discretion of the Court to refuse to grant an application for [190] letters of administration, no such discretion is given in regard to an application for probate by a person selected by a testator for the administration of his estate. Heera Coomar Sircar v. Doorgamani Dasi (1) referred to.

THIS was an appeal arising out of an application for probate of a will under s. 9 of Act No. V of 1881. The applicant, Babu Pran Nath Ghose, and the opposite party, Babu Jado Nath Bhattacharji, were the two executors of the will of Musammat Sonamani Dasi. Jado Nath took out probate of the will in the Court of the District Judge of Benares on the 9th May 1896. Pran Nath seems to have declined to take any part in carrying out his duties as executor, and in fact seems to have been sued by Jado Nath in the Court of Small Causes for the recovery of moneys in his possession belonging to the estate of the testatrix. Subsequently, on the 17th of March 1897, Pran Nath applied to the Court of the District Judge for probate to be granted to him of the will of Musammat Sonamani. This application was opposed by Jado Nath and was dismissed by the Judge, chiefly, it would appear, on the ground that the applicant had been sued by the opposite party in his capacity as executor and a decree had been passed against him in the Benares Small Cause Court. From this order the applicant appealed to the High Court.

respondent Jadu Nath Bhattacharji, executors of the will. On the 9th of May 1896, the latter applied for and obtained probate of the will from the District Court of Benares. On the 17th of March 1897, the appellant also applied for probate of the will. This application was refused by the learned District Judge, and the applicant appeals to this Court. The appeal must succeed. S. 9 of the Act provides [191] that when several executors are appointed probate may be granted to all simultaneously or at different times. If the applicant is an executor named by the will and is under no legal incapacity to act, the Court has no option but to grant him probate. S. 85 of the Act enacts that it is within the discretion of the Court to refuse to grant an application for letters of administration, but no such discretion is given in regard to an application for probate by a person selected by a testator for the administration of his estate. The case of Heera Coomar Sircar v. Doorga Moni Dasi (1) is in point. I decree the appeal, with costs here and in the Court below, and direct the District Judge to grant the application.

RAGHUNATH KUARI AND ANOTHER (Defendants) v. MUNNAN MISR
(Plaintiff).^{*} [23rd December, 1897.]

Hindu law—Mitakshara—Succession—Sister's son.

Held that in the absence of nearer relatives a man may be heir to his mother's brother as regards property which is governed by the Mitakshara law of inheritance. Thakooram Sahiba v. Mohun Lall (2); Rao Kurun Singh v. Nawab Mahomed Fyz Ali Khan (3); Amrita Kumari Devi v. Laksh Narain Chakrabarty (4); Girdhari Lall Roy v. The Bengal Government (5); Naraini Kuar v. Chandi Din (6); and Umaid Bahadur v. Uday Chand (7), referred to.

THIS was a suit to set aside a deed of gift. The plaintiff was the nephew—sister's son—of one Nand Gopal Pande. Nand Gopal died some twenty years before suit and his widow Raghunath Kuari succeeded to the property left by him. On the 29th of April 1894 the widow executed a deed of gift of the property left by Nand Gopal in favour of one Hub Lal, a stranger to the family. The plaintiff thereupon sued to have the deed of gift [192] executed by the widow set aside on the grounds that the property with which it dealt was ancestral and that he (this plaintiff) was the reversioner to the estate of Nand Gopal. The Court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur) gave the plaintiff a decree so far as the immoveable property dealt with by the deed of gift was concerned, but dismissed the suit in respect of the moveable property entered in the deed. The defendants appealed. The Lower Appellate Court (Officiating District Judge of Mirzapur) dismissed the appeal.

The defendants thereupon appealed to the High Court.

^{*} Second Appeal, No. 863 of 1895, from a decree of Kuar Juala Prasad, District Judge of Mirzapur, dated the 2nd May 1895, confirming a decree of Rai Pandit Indar Narain, Subordinate Judge of Mirzapur, dated the 20th September 1894.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR and AIKMAN, JJ.—The appellant Musammât Raghunath Kuari is the widow of one Nand Gopal, who died upwards of twenty years ago leaving certain immoveable property. Nand Gopal died without any issue. On the 29th of April 1892, Musammât Raghunath Kuari executed a deed, in which, after a recital that she is in sole and exclusive possession of the abovementioned immoveable property, she declares that after her death one Hub Lal, a minor, who is unconnected with the family, shall be full owner of this property and of certain moveable property. This deed was registered on the 6th of May 1892. The plaintiff, who is respondent in this appeal, is the son of Nand Gopal's sister. He came into Court on the allegation that the above deed was invalid, inasmuch as Musammât Raghunath Kuari, a childless widow, had no power to make a transfer of the property. He prayed for the cancellation of the deed. He obtained a decree from the Subordinate Judge declaring that the deed, so far as it related to the immoveable property, should be of no effect after the death of Musammât Raghunath Kuari. The deed, so far as it related to the moveable property, was upheld. On appeal this decree was affirmed by the learned District Judge. This second appeal has been brought by Musammât Raghunath Kuari and the minor Hub Lal, who was made a defendant to the suit.

[193] The learned counsel who argued the case on behalf of the appellants put forward two contentions. The first of these was that the execution of the deed in question gave the plaintiff no right of action. We are of opinion that this contention cannot be sustained. We consider that it is immaterial whether the deed be regarded as a deed of gift or as a will. In this deed Musammât Raghunath Kuari undoubtedly asserts a full ownership to the property to which the plaintiff claims he is entitled to succeed on her death. The deed was registered by her in a public office. We consider that there is no doubt that the action of Musammât Raghunath Kuari threw a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, and that it is open to the Court under the provisions of s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act, 1877, to make the decree which it did make as against Musammât Raghunath Kuari. But we are so far with the learned counsel in that we hold that the plaintiff had no cause of action against the minor Hub Lal, inasmuch as the latter had done nothing to assert any title or claim under the deed in his favour. We think that the decree of the lower Court must be modified by dismissing the minor from the suit.

The next contention upon which the learned counsel for the appellant relied in assailing the decree of the Courts below was that a sister's son is no heir according to the Mitakshara law, by which the parties are governed. It is found by the lower Courts that the deceased Nand Gopal left no nearer heirs than the plaintiff. The learned counsel for the appellant contends on the authority of two rulings of the Privy Council, namely, Thakoorain Sahiba v. Mohun Lall (1) and Rao Kurun Singh v. Nawab Mahomed Fyz Ali Khan (2), that a sister's son is no heir according to the Hindu law. The former of these rulings was considered by a Full Bench of the Calcutta High Court in the case of Amrita Kumari Debi v. Lakee Narain Chakrabutty (3) and it was held that it could not be looked on as an authoritative [194] decision against the rights of the sister's son. We entirely concur in the view which was taken by the Calcutta High Court as to the effect of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council. In the second case relied on by the learned counsel, it is true that their Lordships observed, at page 196 of the judgment:—"It is clear that the sister and her descendants find no place in the tables of succession according to the law of the Mitakshara." But it is clear from the judgment that it was not necessary for the Privy Council in this case to decide as to the rights of a sister's son, inasmuch as the point had not been taken in the lower Court. This cannot, in our opinion, be looked on as an authoritative decision binding upon us adverse to the rights of the sister's son. It is true that the sister's son is not mentioned in the Mitakshara amongst other relatives capable of taking by inheritance the property of a deceased Hindu in preference to the king. But, as was held by their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the case Gridhari Lal Roy v. The Bengal Government (1), the text of the Mitakshara "does not purport to be an exhaustive enumeration of all Bandhus who are capable of inheriting, nor was it cited as such, or for that purpose by the author of the Mitakshara; it is used simply as proof or illustration of his proposition, that there are three kinds of classes of Bandhus." In the case just referred to it was held that a maternal uncle is an heir. Their Lordships observed that such an inference, i. e., that a maternal uncle was incapable of taking the property of a deceased Hindu "in the teeth of the passages which say that the king can take only if there be no relatives to the deceased, seems to be violent and unsound." We are of opinion that this observation applies with equal force to the case of the sister's son. In the judgment just quoted their Lordships referred, if not with approval, at all events without disapproval, to the Full Bench decision of the Calcutta High Court which has been mentioned above. In the case Naraini Kuar v. Chandi Din (2) this Court, referring to the Full Bench case of the Calcutta [195] High Court, and to another case—Umaid Bahadur v. Udoi Chand (3)—observed:—"All that these authorities, as it appears to us, establish is that, according to the Mitakshara, which is the law prevailing in these Provinces as to inheritance among Hindus, a sister's son may be heir to his mother's brother, a proposition which appears at one time to have been doubted."

On a review of all the authorities we have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that, in the absence of nearer relatives, a man may be heir to his mother's brother as regards property which is governed by the Mitakshara law of inheritance. This disposes of the second contention of the learned counsel for the appellant. The result is that we modify the decree of the Lower Appellate Court by dismissing the suit as against the minor Hub Lal. As the appeal has substantially failed, the respondent will have his costs in this Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BLAIR, J.:—Rai Radha Krishna brought a suit against Shankar Dat Dube, then Raja of Jaunpur, on a bond alleged to have been given by the Raja's deceased elder brother. The Raja entered an appearance, filed a written statement and appointed pleaders to act for him. One of those pleaders was one Satish Chandar, a pleader practising at Benares. The suit in question was filed in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Benares, and the vakalatnamah which was given by the Raja authorised Satish Chandar and the other pleaders therein named to conduct the suit on behalf of the Raja, and to answer any questions, &c. Satish Chandar obtained more than one adjournment, and on the 31st of January, 1896, he obtained an adjournment until the 19th of March in that year. On the 19th of March when the suit was called on for hearing and disposal, Satish Chandar stated that no one had come near him on the part of the Raja, and that he had no instructions. Thereupon the Subordinate Judge proceeded to dispose of the suit upon the evidence on the record, and, arriving at a finding in favour of the plaintiff, made a decree for the plaintiff. Raja Shankar Dat Dube subsequently applied to the Subordinate Judge under s. 108 of Act No. XIV of 1882 for an order to set aside the decree. The Subordinate Judge, without considering whether Raja Shankar Dat Dube was prevented by sufficient cause from appearing and maintaining his defence at the hearing on the 19th of March, 1896, dismissed the application on the ground that CIVIL. Although Satish Chandar was still the vakil of the Raja, and under his vakalatnamah had full authority to act in the suit [197] within the limits of that vakalatnamah for the Raja he stated that he had no instructions. We understand from that, that he had practically retired from the case. It is difficult to understand how a pleader, even in the Court of the Subordinate Judge of Benares, can conduct a case for the defendant without instructions. It appears to us that the decisions of the Court in Bhagwan Dai v. Hira (1) and of the High Court at Calcutta in Jonardan Dobey v. Ramdhone Singh (2) are authorities in favour of the contention of the appellant that an application lay in this case under s. 108 of Act No. XIV of 1882. On the other hand we have been pressed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff decree-holder with the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sahibzada Zein-ul-abdin Khan v. Sahibzada Ahmad Raza Khan (3). The procedure which the Subordinate Judge must, in our opinion, have adopted was that under s. 157 of Act No. XIV of 1882. That section makes applicable, so far as may be, to cases coming within the section the procedure of Chapter VII of the Code. S. 157 apparently relates to a later period in the litigation than the sections which are to be found in Chapter VII, but there is no difficulty in ascertaining the rule to be followed in cases under s. 157 by reference to Chapter VII. It has been contended for the plaintiff decree-holder that the effect of the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Sahibzada Zein-ul-abdin Khan v. Sahibzada Ahmad Raza Khan (3) is that there can be no decree which can be called a decree ex parte against a defendant who has at any time and on any occasion before the decree is made put in an appearance in the suit, although at the hearing he may have been absent and unrepresented, or may have had present merely a pleader who had no instructions. In our opinion the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council merely referred to the opening paragraph of s. 119 of Act No. VIII of 1859. That section itself shows quite clearly that [198] there can be ex parte decrees against defendants whether or not they have put in appearances in the suit. The prohibition of an appeal in the earlier part of s. 119 is limited, to apply the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council, to a case in which the defendant had not put in any appearance at all. In our opinion the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council has no bearing on the case before us here.

We hold that this was a decree passed ex parte against a defendant within the meaning of s. 108 of Act No. XIV of 1882 for, although the defendant's pleader was physically present in Court, he was not there representing the defendant in the suit. We set aside the order under appeal, and we remand this case under s. 562 of Act No. XIV of 1882 to the Court of the Subordinate Judge to be disposed of on the merits. We make this order with costs to the representative of Raja Shankar Dat Dube.

A held a decree of a competent Court of Revenue for possession of certain land as against B, and obtained under that decree formal possession of the land. B, however, was allowed to remain in such necessary possession of the land as was requisite to enable him to remove a crop which was on the land. B removed his crop, and thereafter sued in a Civil Court for a declaration that he was A's tenant of the land in question holding occupancy rights. A did not defend the suit, and the Civil Court passed a declaratory decree in favour of the plaintiff, and further proceeded to execute that declaratory decree by putting B. in possession. Subsequently B sued A for damages in respect of the alleged removal by A of a second crop, which he asserted that he (B.) had sown upon the said land.

Held that B had no cause of action, and that even if in fact he had sown the crop in respect of which damages were claimed, he did so at his own peril and as a trespasser.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—This was a suit for damages based upon an allegation that the defendants wrongfully cut and appropriated the plaintiff's crop. The facts of the case, so far as they are material, are as follows:—The principal defendant, namely, Raja Udit Narain Singh, obtained an order or decree from a competent Court of Revenue establishing his title to possession of the land and establishing the fact that the plaintiff had got no title, and, the plaintiff being in possession, the Court of Revenue decreed possession to the Raja and gave him formal possession. At that time a crop of the plaintiff's was growing on the land, and the amin, apparently overlooking the fact that s. 42 of the Rent Act (Act No. XII of 1881) did not apply to the case, allowed the plaintiff to continue in such necessary possession as would be requisite for gathering and removing the crop; possession of the land was given to the Raja. The plaintiff gathered and removed the crop, and thereafter brought a suit in a Civil Court for a declaration that he was a tenant of the Raja of the land in question holding occupancy rights. That suit did not lie in the Civil Court, which had no jurisdiction to entertain it. The suit was one which came under s. 95 of Act No. XII of 1881. It was liable to be defeated also on another ground, namely, that, if the plaintiff was entitled, he was not in possession and could have sought consequential relief. For some reason the suit was undefended, probably through an oversight, or through indifference as to what the Civil Court might do in a suit which was not within its jurisdiction. This plaintiff got a decree declaring that he was entitled as an occupancy tenant. The Civil Court, having granted him a declaration of title in a suit in which it had no jurisdiction to interfere, next proceeded to execute its declaratory decree by giving this plaintiff possession, overlooking the fact that the only execution [200] of a declaratory decree is for such costs as may be decreed and may not have been paid. This plaintiff alleges that he sowed the crop in respect of which this action is brought. If he sowed the crop, he sowed it as a trespasser. He had got neither title nor lawful possession. The first Court dismissed this suit. The Court of first appeal set aside the decree of the first Court, and made an order under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order this appeal has been brought. The plaintiff had no cause of action. If in fact the plaintiff did sow the crop in question, which is disputed, he did so at his own risk and as a trespasser. We allow this appeal, and, setting aside the order of the Court of first appeal, we dismiss the appeal to that Court and restore the order of the first Court. The appellant here will have his costs of this appeal and of the appeal to the Court of first appeal.

The plaintiffs are Gangaputras, and have no doubt themselves, as have, it is alleged, their ancestors, exercised their functions upon the Sarsaiya ghat. Others of the same class have done the same. What they claim is a right as Gangaputras to occupy to the exclusion of all other persons certain particular defined and measured spots upon the ghat. Their claim is based exclusively upon prescription. The defendants are the Municipal Board of Cawnpore, and, in the absence of proof to the contrary, must be presumed to have been acting within their jurisdiction in relation to the matters complained of, unless their right of control and interference is limited by some right acquired by the plaintiffs. No argument has been addressed to us questioning their general jurisdiction. The history of the ghat is not absolutely clear, but this much we can gather from the pleadings and the admissions of the parties, that there has been at some time, probably remote, a dedication of the ghat to the use of pilgrims desiring to perform their spiritual ablutions in the sacred river. Beyond doubt for the proper performance of those ablutions and accompanying ceremonies the services of Gangaputras would be required. We have nothing before us to show that the plaintiffs claim any interest in the soil upon which the ghat stands. Their allegation amounts simply to this:— "We and our ancestors as Gangaputras, and for the performance of our functions of Gangaputras, have continuously and for an indefinite time occupied, [202] to the exclusion of all other Gangaputras and of all other persons whatsoever, the particular spots which we claim. We are, therefore, they say, entitled as of right now and in the future to use these spots as we have done heretofore." It was upon that ground that the Subordinate Judge in appeal decreed their suit, which had been dismissed upon the ground of limitation in the Court of first instance.

The judgment, the appeal against which we are now hearing, is one of the most inadequate and perfunctory performances that has ever come before us. It deals with and discusses none of the questions of law, serious and important as they are, raised in this case. It assumes that the user alleged by the plaintiffs would, if proved, be a sufficient basis of title in the present and for the future. The defendants in their written statement alleged, and it is nowhere denied, that the land of the ghat belongs to Government, and that the management and protection of such lands as are situate within the limits of the Municipality are under their control. The interference of which the plaintiffs complain was, the defendants allege, an arrangement by them of the seats to be occupied by the Gangaputras at such places as the defendants thought proper, and they contend that the plaintiffs have no right to object to such arrangement.

The defendants also, in answer to the claim by virtue of prescription, allege that the plaintiffs have not had uninterrupted user or user, as of right, upon the ghat, but that such user has periodically been prohibited by them one day per year from 1870 up to the present date.

That is one of the important pleas which appeared unworthy of the notice of the Subordinate Judge, and yet, if that were established, coupled with the absence of proof that such interruption had ever been contested by any person interested, the strongest presumption would have been raised that the occupation by the plaintiffs of the part of the ghat occupied by them was permissive only and was not an occupation as of right. Indeed, it would have been possible upon that single plea to have dismissed the suit of the plaintiffs. [203] There are, however, questions raised in this case of larger scope, which may well be decided in this appeal, inasmuch as they may affect other similar claims in which particular incidents to be found in this case are absent. It is only fair to say that Mr. Moti Lal, for the respondents, frankly admitted that the claim of the plaintiffs could not in point of law be described as an easement. It is enough therefore to say that, inasmuch as the claim of the plaintiffs was not based upon any allegation of right either in the soil of the ghat or in any other soil to which their user of the ghat was appurtenant, and inasmuch as neither the English nor the Indian law recognizes such a right as an easement in gross, the plaintiffs have to establish their claim upon some other basis.

Mr. Moti Lal contended then that the right of the plaintiffs was of the nature of a customary right and fell within the scope and meaning of s. 18 of the Easements Act of 1882. We fail to see the applicability of that section to the facts of the case. The illustrations given both imply some right of ownership, occupation or habitation of some particular place. A number of cases have been brought to our attention, of which perhaps the most important one is that of Tyron v. Smith (1). That was a suit in which the lord of the manor sued in trespass a person who had erected or begun to erect a booth upon some part of his estate. The defendant's statement was, put shortly, that by ancient custom a public fair was held upon that manor, and that for the convenience of persons frequenting it all victuallers were allowed from time immemorial to erect booths for the supply of refreshments. It was held that the custom had been proved and that it was a reasonable custom. That case in no way helps the contention of the respondent. The right pleaded was really the right of the public to have stalls erected for their refreshments and not an exclusive right claimed by one of the victuallers to occupy any particular spot. And it may be taken generally that the English law recognizes no right of the nature of easements, and not being easements, other than public as distinct from private rights, though such rights may be [204] limited to the inhabitants of a manor or township, but within that limit they are publici and not privati juris. In the present case it appears manifest, indeed it is not denied, that the dedication of the ghat must have been a dedication to the use of the public desiring, according to their religion, to use the water of the river, and such right conveyed by such dedication does not seem to carry with it any restriction upon the number of Gangaputras who might wish to perform their functions upon their disciples, nor does it imply a right of any particular Gangaputras to occupy to the exclusion of other Gangaputras any particular spot. A case has been decided in this Court by two Judges which seems to us a sufficient authority for the contention of the appellants in this appeal. It is the case of Husain Ali v. Matukman (2). The plaintiff's suit in that case was dismissed on the ground that no right of any sort to the soil of the ghat or any portion thereof was asserted by the plaintiff or shown. The dictum, broadly laid down, is in our opinion equally applicable to the facts of the present case, which do not substantially differ from those of the reported case. Now in this case also no right to the soil of the ghat or any portion thereof is asserted by the plaintiffs or shown, and under such circumstances, following the decision above cited, we hold that the plaintiffs cannot maintain a claim to the exclusive use of the ghat for the purpose of collecting alms or fees to the exclusion of other persons. The ratio decidendi in Husain Ali v. Matukman appears to us open to no exception. It matters not in our opinion that the claim in this case refers only to a part of the ghat, and that opinion is amply supported by authority. I see no reason to find that there is any difference in principle between the dedication of a ghat to the public use and the dedication of a high road. It has been held, and the principle appears indisputable, that where a dedication has been established of a high road and where a portion only out of the land so dedicated has been used for that purpose, no person could by occupation or other user of any part of the road establish a right as against the public over any part of the [205] land, even had it never been used for the purpose for which it was dedicated. I refer to Turner v. Ringwood Highway Board (1). That is a decision of one of the most eminent Judges of the century, and the judgment itself is founded upon reasoning which has been, as far as I know, universally applied in all cases of this kind. Now here the dedication to the public could not be limited by invasion of any of the members of the public, nor could they by such invasion, however prolonged, gain for themselves a title to the land or to the exclusive user of the land which was the subject of the invasion. And the reason is manifest, that such user by them was a licensed user; they had a right to be there, but their right of user could carry with it no right to exclude other persons—Gangaputras, pilgrims or others, for whose use the ghat had been originally dedicated.

The result is that I would allow this appeal, and, reversing the decision of the lower appellate Court, dismiss the suit of the plaintiffs with costs.

AIKMAN, J.—I concur in thinking that this appeal must be allowed. The learned advocate who appears on behalf of the respondents admitted that the right claimed by the plaintiffs, his clients, was not an easement; he said that, if put to a definition, he would describe it as an assertion of a customary right. But the relief which the plaintiffs asked for and the decree which they have obtained amount to much more than this. The decree gives them possession of certain spots on a public ghat to the exclusion of all other members of the public. No instance of such a relief having been granted has been cited to us. There are, it is true, cases in which plaintiffs have successfully asserted a title to enjoy customary rights, but the decrees in those cases did not interfere with the enjoyment of the other members of the public or section of the public entitled to the customary right. In my opinion this case is not distinguishable from the case of Husain Ali v. Matukman (2), which, as my brother Blair has shown, is in accord with the law as laid down in England. I concur in the decree proposed.

[206] BY THE COURT.—The decree of the Court is that the appeal is allowed, the decree of the lower appellate Court is set aside and that of the Court of first instance restored. The appellants will have their costs here and in the lower appellate Court.

Appeal decreed.

Criminal Procedure Code s. 110 et seqq—Security for good behaviour—Object of demanding security—Discretion of Magistrate in accepting or refusing sureties tendered.

The object of requiring security to be of good behaviour is, not to obtain money for the Crown by the forfeiture of recognizances, but to insure that the particular accused person shall be of good behaviour for the time mentioned in the order. It is therefore reasonable to expect and require that the sureties to be tendered should not be sureties from such a distance as would make it unlikely that they could exercise any control over the man for whom they were willing to stand surety. Narain Sooboddhee (1) not followed.

RAHIM BAKHSH was found by the Joint Magistrate of Saharanpur, acting under s. 110 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, to be an habitual burglar and receiver of stolen property, and was called upon to enter into a bond for Rs. 500, with two sureties each in Rs. 250, to be of good behaviour for one year. From this order he appealed to the Magistrate of the district, who, after adverting to the evidence upon which the Joint Magistrate's order was based and signifying his approval of that order, went on to say:—"The security offered was that of persons living at a distance from Saharanpur where appellant lives. If the security is to be of any value for the purpose for which it is demanded, it must be offered by a person living near appellant's home where he can exercise efficient supervision over him. If such is offered it will be accepted." Against this order Rahim Bakhsh applied in revision to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J.—This is an application in revision. An order was made that a certain person proceeded against by a Magistrate under s. 110 and the following sections of the Code of Criminal Procedure should give security himself and should obtain two sureties for his good behaviour for one year. It is obvious that the man Rahim Bakhsh was a man against whom such an order should have been made. His own witness, who is a respectable man, gave him an exceedingly bad character. It was proved to the satisfaction of the Magistrate that he was an associate of professional burglars and a receiver of stolen property. He lived and carried on an ostensible business of a milk seller (which in itself is an innocent occupation for a gentleman of his character), in the city of Saharanpur. The sureties whom he tendered lived in the Roorkee tahsil. One had been rejected when first offered. On his own examination he showed that he knew practically nothing of the man for whom he was coming from Roorkee to act as surety. The Magistrate considered that sureties at Roorkee would probably have but little influence over a gentleman like Rahim Bakhsh residing at Saharanpur. In my opinion the Magistrate came to a proper conclusion. The object of requiring security to be of behaviour is, not to obtain money for the Crown by the forfeiture of recognizances, but to insure that the particular accused person shall be of good behaviour for the time mentioned in the order. It seems to me to be reasonable to expect and require that the sureties to be tendered should not be sureties from such a distance as would make it unlikely that they could exercise any control over the man for whom they were willing to stand surety. Of course Magistrates must not act arbitrarily in these cases: they must be guided in each case by the facts of the case. I am certainly not prepared to follow the decision of the Calcutta Court in the case of Narain Sooboddhee. (1) I dismiss this application.

[208] APPELLATE CIVIL.

*Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Burkitt.*SHARF-UD-DIN KHAN (Judgment-debtor) v. FATEHYAB KHAN (Decree-holder).^{*} [17th January, 1897.]Mesne profits—Execution of decree—Objection to assessment of mesne profits—Trespasser not allowed expenses of obtaining decrees for rent during the term of his possession.

Held that a trespasser, who, after having been for some time in possession of immoveable property, was ejected in execution of a decree obtained by the rightful owner, could not have allowed to him in reduction of mesne profits expenses incurred by him in obtaining decrees for rent against tenants on the property in suit.

[Expl., 23 A. 252 (256).]

THE respondent to this appeal obtained against the appellant a decree for possession of immoveable property and for mesne profits, the mesne profits to be ascertained in execution of the decree. The decree-holder applied to the executing Court for ascertainment for the mesne profits, claiming Rs. 1,248-5-0. The judgment-debtor filed objections to this application urging that the mesne profits were wrongly calculated by the decree-holder, and that certain expenses of collection and expenses incurred in bringing suits against tenants during his occupation of the land ought to be deducted from the amount of mesne profits awarded. The Court (Subordinate Judge of Moradabad) disallowed the judgment-debtor's objections and assessed the mesne profits at the amount claimed by the decree-holder. From this order the judgment-debtor appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Ram Prasad and Maulvi Ghulam Mujtaba, for the appellant.
The respondent was not represented.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—This appeal arises out of an assessment of mesne profits. The appellant complains, firstly, that he was deprived of the benefit of evidence in the suit which was on the record in the High Court at the time when the mesne profits were being assessed. In order to support that ground, it [209] would be necessary to show that the evidence he desired to have was material. He has not taken the trouble to procure the production of that record here, and he has failed to prove that one word of that evidence was material. He also complains that in taking the account for mesne profits he was allowed an insufficient sum for expenses. His claim for expenses was made up of, amongst other things, a claim for the salary of two karindas. That portion of the claim alone would have brought the expenses on the amount collected to something near 12 per cent., an allowance which we could never sanction in favour of a wrong-doer. It would be excessive in any case. However, his main complaint as to expenses relates to the fact that he was disallowed the expenses he was put to in suing tenants on the estates, who were not his tenants, who owed him no rent, but against whom he obtained decrees for rent. The result shows that the appellant was never entitled to those decrees. He was a wrong-doer. He was not entitled to the possession of the land, nor was he entitled to the receipt of rents and profits. It may well be, and certainly the contrary has not been shown, that, if the decree-holder, the rightful owner, had not been disturbed in possession by the appellant and had been in possession, all his tenants would have paid their rents and there would have been no necessity for a single suit against any of them. Expenses of decrees for rent obtained under such circumstances by a wrong-doer who is not entitled to them certainly cannot be allowed to him in the assessment of mesne profits. We dismiss this appeal.

PRIVY COUNCIL.

PRESENT:

Lords Watson, Hobhouse, and Pavey and Sir R. Couch.
[On appeal from the High Court for the North-Western Provinces.]

NARAIN DAS (Plaintiff) Appellant v. RAMANUJ DAYAL (Defendant)
Respondent. [16th November and 15th December, 1897.]

Intention as to future action, expressed between parties, not amounting to a contract.

A mutual expression of intention between parties caused expectation on either side that the intention would be carried out, but no contract was made.

[210] A childless person, since deceased, expressed to the father of the minor son of his sister his intention to make the boy his heir, and that if he, the intending donor, should have children of his own, he would give the boy a share of his property.

The father assented, and made over charge of the boy.

The widows, and mother, of the deceased, taking his estate for their lives, admitted the boy to joint possession with them; and on being sued by the reversioners of the family estate expectant upon their deaths, defended, as co-defendants with the boy, on the ground that they had, in obedience to the known wishes of the deceased, recognized the boy as heir to him.

Held, that the reversioners could only be deprived of the inheritance after the death of the widows, who could not transfer any estate to last beyond their own lives, by the act of the deceased in contracting with the father of the boy to make the boy the heir, if such contract had been made. And that the substantial question was whether the representations made between the two had amounted to a contract to that effect.

On evidence, wholly oral, it was found that no such contract had been made.

Only enough had been said between the two to give rise to expectation on either side that the boy would, the then intended course being followed, get the inheritance.

APPEAL from a decree (9th February 1893) of a Divisional Bench of the High Court reversing a decree (29th September 1892) of the Subordinate Judge of Meerut.

This suit was brought on the 31st July 1888 by six plaintiffs, among whom was the present appellant, for a decree declaring their title as reversionary heirs after the deaths of the two widows of their deceased kinsman Durga Prasad, a zamindar, and village shareholder, in the Meerut district, who was killed in an affray on the 1st August 1882, at the age of twenty-nine years. He had no children, and had made no will. The plaintiffs claimed a declaration that their rights were not affected by the acts of the widows in setting up Ramanuj Dayal, a minor son of the sister of the late Durga Prasad as the heir to the property of the deceased, and in putting him into possession of it jointly with themselves.

The widows, and the mother of the deceased, were made co-defendants with Ramanuj, now the only respondent on this appeal. The only appellant was Lala Narain Das, the fifth plaintiff, who represented Kishen Sahai, the first of them, the [211] latter having been found by the High Court to stand in lieu the more remote agnates of the deceased.

The substantial question raised by this appeal was whether the late Durga Prasad had contracted with the respondent's father, acting on the respondent's behalf, when a minor, to make the latter his heir, if he, Durga Prasad, should die childless, and if not, but having had children, to give a portion of his property to the boy. And whether such a disposal of the inheritance was binding upon the appellant.

The prayer of the plaint was for a declaration that Ramanuj was not the heir of Durga Prasad, or entitled to the possession of his estate, and for an order that the widows should invest the surplus income of the property for their benefit.

It was admitted by the plaint, that the deceased proprietor was absolute owner of all his estates, and that therefore he might have disposed of them as he chose, by deed or by will,

The defendants put in written statements, all substantially to the same effect. Their case was, that Durga Prasad had brought up Ramanuj Dayal from childhood in his own house, and had promised his father to make him his heir; that he had died suddenly before he could carry out his intentions, and that the widows, in obedience to his known wishes, had put the boy in possession of the property, and recognized him as heir.

The Subordinate Judge, Rai Piari Lal, fixed an issue as to the fact of the making, and as to the legal validity of a contract between Durga Prasad and Ganga Saran, the boy's father, to the above effect. He considered the evidence, and the law of contract, citing several of the cases afterwards referred to in the argument of this appeal, and concluded that no such contract had been made. In his opinion the elements of a binding contract were wanting. He found so far as the boy was concerned no duty or obligation was cast upon him to remain with Durga Prasad. His status was never altered, wherein this case was distinguishable from Bhola Nahana v. Parbhu Hari (1), nor did the relation of father [212] and son ever cease between Ganga Saran and the boy. Durga Prasad could not have prevented the father from taking the boy away. Also, he found that the widows, though they had caused to be entered in the proprietary register the name of Ramanuj Dayal together with their own names, had not conveyed their life interests to him by any formal act.

He therefore made a declaratory decree that the reversioners of Durga Prasad, on the death of his widows, would be entitled to succeed to his property, and that the rest of the claim should be dismissed. Ramanuj Dayal appealed to the High Court against the conclusion of the Subordinate Judge as a matter of law, that no contract had been made which was legally binding so as to affect the inheritance. But no appeal was made against the finding of facts as stated in his judgment.

The observations of the Divisional Bench (TYRRELL and BLAIR, JJ.) so far as they are material to this report, appear in the judgment of their Lordships. The judgment of the Subordinate Judge was reversed.

On this appeal—

Mr. A. Cohen. Q. C., and Mr. C. W. Arathoon, for the appellant, argued that the whole case for the respondent had been based upon an alleged promise which had never reached the stage of contract, and, in fact, had gone no further than the representation of the then present intention on the part of Durga Prasad. There had been no evidence that the latter had bound himself to accept the boy as his heir under all circumstances, or to deal with his estate, or any part of it, so that it should pass, on his death, to Ramanuj.

Nor had Ganga Saran, the father of the boy, been shown to have effectually parted with his son, or to have relinquished all right to parental control over him. The result had been only to signify the intention existing at the time on either side. The Subordinate Judge had rightly decided that the appellant, amongst the other plaintiffs, was entitled to a decree declaring his right to succeed to the family estate on the death of the widows of [213] Durga Prasad. No sufficient reason had been assigned in the judgment of the High Court for reversing that decree in favour of the present appellant. Section 42 of the Specific Relief Act, I of 1877, was referred to, within which came the appellant as a person entitled to a right, and therefore by that section empowered to institute a suit against a person denying it. It was true that the Court had a discretion to refuse a declaratory decree; but here there were no grounds for such refusal.

Reference was made to Jorden v. Money (2); Alderson v. Maddison (3); Citizens' Bank of Louisiana v. The First National Bank of New Orleans (4), where the rule in Jorden v. Money was approved, as to the distinction in effect between representation of intention, and representation of fact; Coverdale v. Eastwood (5), where it was decided that expression of intention did not amount to contract to settle and to Rani Anand Koer v. The Court of Wards (6), where the appeal was presented by the nearest reversioner's heir.

Mr. M. Crackanthorpe, Q. C., and Mr. J. D. Mayne, for the respondent, argued that, from the evidence, the promise by Durga Prasad to make the boy his heir had been based on a consideration proceeding from Ganga Saran, the father, completed when the boy was made over to Durga Prasad. That this promise had been made had been found by both the Courts below, although the first Court had held that it created no legal obligation. It was submitted that the consideration supported the promise, and that the latter was legally binding, so that it had become the duty of the widows, who for this purpose represented the estate, to carry this promise into effect. Gange Saran had not only agreed to allow, but had allowed the boy for years to remain free from his control, and the boy had been maintained and educated, at first by Durga Prasad, and then by the widows. There was no such abandonment by Ganga Saran [214] of his parental authority and responsibility as to make the consideration supplied by Ganga Saran illegal. Reference was made to Lyons v. Blenkin (1), one of the cases where the custody of children was refused to the father, and to Bhala Nahana v. Parbhu Hari (2), where the gift of a boy was made by his parents on the express promise to settle property on him, and that he had by their permission altered his status, and foregone his claim to inherit from them, did not render it altogether inapplicable here. Also was cited—The Queen v. Smith, in re Boreham (3).

Mr. A. Cohen, Q. C., replied.

Afterwards on the 15th December 1897, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by SIR R. COUCH.

JUDGMENT.

Durga Prasad who died childless on the 1st of August 1882, leaving two widows Ram Dei and Hira Dei was the grandson of Bakhtawar Singh, the son of Jawahir who had also three other sons Dilawar Singh, Kishan Sahai and Har Sahai. Dilawar died leaving an adopted son Chanda Lal, Har Sahai died leaving four sons, Anand Sarup, Jugal Kishore, Narain Das and Ram Saran Das. The suit was brought by Kishan Sahai, Chanda Lal and the four sons of Har Sahai against the respondent and the widows and the mother of Durga Prasad. The plaint stated that in order to defeat the rights of the reversioners the widows had caused the name of the respondent to be entered in respect of most of the properties left by Durga Prasad along with theirs, and his name alone in respect of some, on the false allegations that Durga Prasad left them and Ramanuj Dayal the minor son of his sister as his heirs; that he owing to his having no issue kept Ramanuj Dayal with him as his adopted son and heir promising that in case of his having no male issue he and his descendants should succeed as owners to the entire property left by him, but that they should have no right to waste the property; and that in case of his having a son of his own [215] Ramanuj Dayal should get an equal share with him; that he had brought him up, educated him and celebrated his marriage as if he was his own son; that the widows in their own right and as guardians of the minor were heirs in possession of his estate. And the plaintiffs prayed that it might be declared that these allegations being false the transfers of the estate of Durga Prasad made on them in favour of Ramanuj Dayal were void as against the plaintiffs or the persons who at the death of the widows would be reversioners, and that the statement that Ramanuj Dayal or his descendants were entitled to the estate of Durga Prasad by virtue of any declaration falsely attributed to him was of no effect and false. The widows in their written statement said that as their husband was killed suddenly he could not execute any document in favour of Ramanuj Dayal, and they therefore in accordance with his promise and order made over the entire property to him. The mother in her written statement said the same. Ramanuj Dayal in his written statement said that Durga Prasad had a great affection for him from his childhood and constantly kept him with him and eventually entered into a contract with him through his father, his guardian, to make him proprietor of and heir to all his property; from that time he lived with Durga Prasad as his son and the widows in pursuance of the stipulations and directions of their husband continued to maintain and bring him up during his minority and gave him possession of all the estate left by Durga Prasad. Upon these pleadings the following issue was settled by the Subordinate Judge:—

"Did Lala Durga Prasad covenant with defendant's father on his behalf to make the defendant his heir and owner of the property, and in the event of his having issue to give a portion of the property to the defendant? Is such a covenant, if proved, good and binding upon the plaintiff?"

This was the substantial question in the suit. Durga Prasad having died childless the widows were entitled to his property during their lives and could dispose of their interest in favour [216] of Ramanuj Dayal, but they could not go beyond that. If the reversioners were to be bound, it must be by the act of Durga Prasad. There was no issue whether the allegations of the widows were false. It was not necessary, as if they were true they would not justify the action of the widows if there was no contract by Durga Prasad as was alleged by Ramanuj Dayal. The evidence of the widows as to what was said by Durga Prasad and Ganga Saran when the alleged covenant or agreement was made is only hearsay and, to use the language of the Indian Evidence Act, is not relevant. It was admitted by the Subordinate Judge and is in the record, but it ought now to be disregarded. The evidence of Jwala Prasad another witness is too vague and uncertain to have any weight. The principal witness is Ganga Saran, the father of the respondent, who is corroborated in some respects by Diwan Singh, but without that his evidence may be considered trustworthy. Their Lordships have considered the whole of his evidence which is material to the question of a contract, but it is sufficient to state the part which is directly applicable to it. At page 255 of the Record he says that Durga Prasad said to him:—"My property is for this boy, I have no dearer relation in this world than this boy. I will give my property to this boy. He goes to members of the brotherhood on my behalf and does my household business. If you will take him with you how shall I manage these affairs." At last Durga Prasad uttered these words:—"I would make him my heir and he would get sufficient education at Meerut for my business." I said to him:—"Two years have elapsed since your marriage. It is hoped that you may get an issue and your own son may soon be competent to manage your affairs." Thereupon he said:—"Even if a son be born, mind that I would give a share to Ramanuj Dayal. It is by no means my intention that I may in any way deprive him, but give up this hope that I would ever part with him and allow

" 'him to go with you.' Lal Jwala Prasad made me understand that my object was the welfare of the boy, [217] that he could not remain with me, for if I got him admitted into the college or sent him to England he could become separated from me, and that I should do what Durga Prasad liked. I, thinking that he will be recompensed here for education in England and that it was impossible to take the boy without complete displeasure of Durga Prasad and that I did not like to displease him, told Durga Prasad that the boy was his if he wished to keep him, and that I would not interfere in this affair. Up to that time there was no other son of mine. I finally left the boy saying that I waived all claim to the boy and the thought of taking him did not remain in my mind." The reference to the college and England is explained by Ganga Saran having said in the previous part of his evidence that he told Durga Prasad that he wanted to take the boy to Agra (where there is a college) and there educate him, and that he wished he should be educated in England "either for service or for the Bar." At this time the respondent was nine years old; and, being the son of a sister, Durga Prasad could not according to Hindu law have adopted him. The only way by which the respondent could be made his heir was by a deed of gift or by a will. Diwan Singh in his evidence said that Durga Prasad about two months before his death asked him to write out a deed of gift in favour of Ramanuj Dayal and, upon his saying it was not proper to do so and asking him whether he should write out a will, told him to do so, that the matter was put off from time to time and the will was not written.

Upon the evidence in the case their Lordships are of opinion that there was no contract or agreement, there was only an expectation on each side, on the part of Durga Prasad that if the respondent continued to live with him and was brought up and educated under his care and control the respondent would be induced by the prospect of becoming his heir to continue to live with him, and on the part of Ganga Saran that if he gave up the boy Durga Prasad would have him educated and make him his heir. Ganga Saran could according to any view only bind the [218] respondent during his minority, and it is very difficult to believe that it was their intention that Durga Prasad should be bound in all events to make the boy his heir when upon the respondent attaining majority Durga Prasad would have no control over him and he might determine to leave him. Gratitude would be a very weak obligation upon the respondent if he knew that the estate must become his. The Subordinate Judge found that Durga Prasad made a promise to Ganga Saran that he would make the respondent his heir if he had no male issue or would give him a share in his property if he had such, but that it did not amount to a contract and was not binding on the reversioners. He made a decree declaring that the reversioners of Durga Prasad deceased should after the death of the widows and the mother of the deceased be entitled to get the estate of the deceased by right of inheritance, and that the rest of the plaintiffs' claim should be dismissed. Ramanuj Dayal appealed to the High Court at Allahabad, and that Court ordered the decree of the Subordinate Judge to be set aside and the suit to be dismissed. Their Lordships are quite unable to agree in the reasons of the two learned Judges of the High Court for making this decree. They appear to their Lordships to have entirely disregarded the question in the suit (whether what passed between Durga Prasad and Ganga Saran amounted to a contract) and indeed in the former part of their reasons to have misconceived the real question in the case, and in

KASHI PRASAD (Defendant) v. KEDAR NATH SAHU AND OTHERS
(Plaintiffs).^{*} [17th December, 1897.]

Act No. IX of 1872 (Indian Contract Act), s. 23—Void contract—Agreement to relinquish ex-proprietary rights—Partition—Act No. XII of 1881 (N.-W P. Rent Act), ss. 7 and 9—Act No. XIX of 1873 (N.-W. P. Land Revenue Act), s. 125.

By a mutual agreement entered into between the parties to a private partition of certain villages held by them jointly the parties agreed that, if either party at the time of the partition was holding sir land in a village which upon partition fell into the share of the other party, he would relinquish his rights in such sir land in favour of the party into whose share the said village had fallen.

Held that under such private partition, the holder of the sir land became, on partition being effected, an ex-proprietary tenant in respect of the land previously held by him as sir, and that consequently the agreement to relinquish his rights in such land was not enforceable in law.

Held also that s. 125 of Act No. XIX of 1873 does not apply to a partition by private agreement. Gaya Singh v. Udit Singh (1) referred to. Ram Prasad v. Dina Kuar (2) dissented from by Knox and Banerji, JJ.

THE facts of this case are briefly as follows :—

The parties were co-sharers in a number of villages. By an instrument, dated the 20th of May 1891, they partitioned their shares, and some entire villages were allotted to the share of the plaintiffs and other villages to that of the defendant. It was agreed that each party should surrender to the other the sir lands held by him in the villages assigned to the share of the other. The plaintiffs performed their part of the agreement, and surrendered to the defendant the sir land held by them in the village Sehri, which fell to the defendant's share, but the defendant, whilst retaining in his possession the sir lands of the plaintiffs, refused to deliver up to the plaintiffs the sir lands held by him in the village Barghat which was assigned on partition to the plaintiffs. The [220] plaintiffs brought the present suit to recover from the defendant the sir lands in the village Barghat. The defendant asserted that he had acquired the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in respect of those lands and that the agreement to relinquish was void as it was forbidden by law. The court of first instance (Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur) decreed the plaintiffs' claim. The defendant thereupon appealed to the High Court.

Pandit Sundar Lal, for the appellant. By the deed of partition the defendant lost his proprietary rights in the village in question within the meaning of s. 7 of Act No. XII of 1881. He therefore became in respect of the land held by him as in that village an ex-proprietary tenant. Being an ex-proprietary tenant any agreement by him to transfer his ex-proprietary rights was prohibited by s. 9 of the said Act. These sections (viz., 7 and 9) apply to a loss of proprietary rights resulting from a partition amongst co-sharers. Section 125 of Act No. XIX of 1873 applies only to partitions effected by the Revenue authorities for Revenue purposes and will not apply to a case such as the present where the partition was by private agreement. Besides the case of Ram Prasad v. Dina Kuar (1) cited in the judgment of Banerji, J., the advocate for the appellant referred to Indar v. Khushi (2), Hanuman Rai v. Kariman (3) and Gulab Rai v. Indar Singh (4).

Mr. W. Wallech, for the respondents. The agreement to partition was per se a valid agreement enforceable in law. The proviso for the mutual exchange of sir land was added as an afterthought after all the substantive provisions of the agreement had been completed, and as a matter of convenience, so that each party should hold the whole of the villages that had fallen to their share on partition. The whole agreement was purely voluntary, no money consideration passing. Each party before the agreement possessed 50 per cent. of the property, and by the agreement the parties exchanged certain of their interests, so that in the result they still possessed 50 per cent. of the whole, and under s. 9 [221] of the Rent Act, 1881, a voluntary transfer is lawful between persons "in favour of whom as co-sharers such right originally arose." Under s. 125 of Act No. XIX of 1873 sir land belonging to one co-sharer can be assigned on partition to another co-sharer if the co-sharer cultivating it consents. In this case the co-sharer consented by the agreement. There is nothing in the Act to show that the proviso contained in s. 125 is not meant to apply to private partitions. Counsel for the respondents relied on Abhai Pandey v. Bhagwan Pandey (5), Indar Sen v. Naubat Singh (6) and Gaya Singh v. Udit Singh (7).

Pandit Sundar Lal replied.

JUDGMENTS.

BANERJI, J. (KNOX, J., concurring).—I agree with my learned colleagues in holding that the defendant acquired the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in the land held by him as sir in the villages which have been assigned by partition to the share of the plaintiffs. The parties were co-sharers in a number of villages. By an instrument, dated the 20th of May 1891, they partitioned their shares, and some entire villages were allotted to the share of the plaintiffs and other villages to that of the defendant. It was agreed that each should surrender to the other the sir lands held by him in the villages assigned to the share of the other. The plaintiffs performed their part of the agreement, and surrendered to the defendant the sir land held by them in the village Sheri, which has fallen into the defendant's share, but the latter, whilst retaining in his possession the sir lands of the plaintiffs, has refused to deliver up to the plaintiffs the sir lands held by him in the village Barghat, which has been assigned by partition to the share of the plaintiffs. He asserts that he has acquired the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in respect of those lands and that the agreement to relinquish them is void, as it is forbidden by law. Upon this contention two questions arise :—first, whether the defendant has acquired the rights [222] of an ex-proprietary tenant in regard to his sir land, and, secondly, whether, if he has acquired such rights, the agreement made by him to surrender them is legally enforceable.

In my opinion both these questions must be decided in favour of the defendant. Under the partition of the 20th of May 1891, the share which the defendant had in the mahal in which he held sir lands, has been assigned to the plaintiffs, and he has obtained in exchange for that share villages in other mahals. He has therefore "lost or parted with his proprietary rights" in the mahal in which he held the sir lands. By s. 7 of Act No. XII of 1881, "every person who may hereafter lose or part with his proprietary rights in any mahal shall have a right of occupancy in the land held by him as sir in such mahal at the date of such loss or parting" at a favourable rate of rent, and he shall be called an ex-proprietary tenant. The defendant therefore has under this section acquired the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in the land held by him as sir in the villages which have under partition passed into the share of the plaintiffs. The language of s. 7 is wide enough to apply to transfers of every description by which a proprietor may lose or part with his proprietary rights, and there is nothing in it to exclude from its operation the case of a partition effected by the co-charers by mutual agreement. It has been contended that the Legislature never intended s. 7 to apply to an exchange of shares by partition, and reference has been made in support of this contention to the provisions of s. 125 of the North-Western Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1873. The intention of the Legislature must be gathered from the language employed by it, and I find nothing in the provision of s. 7 to warrant the supposition that it was not intended to apply to a private partition. The words used in that section are only consistent with the policy which dictated it, namely, that no proprietor whose rights as such have passed away from him should be wholly denuded of everything he had in the mahal in which he held those rights, and that he should be secured in the occupation of the sir lands held by him in that mahal. That policy in my opinion [223] applies as much to the transfer of proprietary rights under a private partition as to any other description of transfer of such rights, and therefore there is no reason in my judgment for holding that the Legislature did not intend the provisions of s. 7 to be applicable to private partitions. Section 125 of Act No. XIX of 1873, it is true, provides in its second paragraph that if under the partition of a mahal the sir land of one co-sharer be assigned to another co-sharer, the former will have the rights of an occupancy tenant in respect of such land if he continue to cultivate it. There cannot be any doubt that under the North-Western Provinces Rent Act the rights of a mere occupancy tenant are different in their incidents from those of an ex-proprietary tenant, and it seems that the Legislature in that Act regarded an ex-proprietary tenancy as of a higher status than the tenancy of a mere occupancy tenant. I am therefore unable to agree with the learned Judges who held in Ram Prasad v. Dina Kuar (1) that a co-sharer whose share has been assigned to another co-sharer acquires under s. 125 the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in respect of his sir lands. Section 125 is, in my judgment, an exception to the general rule laid down in s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1881. That section has taken the place of a similar section in Act No. XVIII of 1873, which was passed on the same day as Act No. XIX of 1873. Reading the two Acts together, and having regard to the fact that both of them were under the consideration of the Legislature at one and the same time, it seems to me that the intention of the Legislature was to enact a general rule in s. 7 of Act No. XVIII of 1873 and provide an exception to that rule in Act No. XIX of 1873 in the case to which s. 125 of that Act applies. What the policy of the Legislature may have been in conferring on an ex-proprietor in respect of his sir land the rights of a mere occupancy tenant in the case of a partition held under Act No. XIX of 1873, and the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in the case of a private partition by mutual agreement, it is not easy to conceive. But I am [224] unable to hold that the Legislature did not intend s. 7 of Act No. XII of 1881 to include within the scope of its operation a partition effected by the co-sharers by private arrangement. I am therefore of opinion that the defendant acquired the rights of an ex-proprietary tenant in the sir lands held by him in the villages which have been allotted to the plaintiff's share.

By the terms of the deed of partition the defendant agreed to surrender his sir lands to the plaintiffs upon the latter's doing the same in regard to their own sir. The terms are these:—"According to this partition the sir lands and the houses of a party situated in a village shall go to the other party's share along with the village in which they are situated; consequently, the party who will get possession of the village shall be considered by reason of its falling to his lot to be the proprietor of the sir lands, and the houses situate in such village. Should any party fail to give up possession of the houses and the sir lands the proprietor of the village shall have the said person's possession removed from the houses and the sir lands." In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiffs have delivered possession of their sir lands to the defendant, and it is certainly an act of bad faith on the part of the defendant to retain in his own possession the sir lands of the plaintiffs and to refuse to give them in exchange his own sir lands. But what we have to consider is whether the defendant can be compelled in law to surrender his sir. The agreement referred to above is nothing more than an agreement to relinquish the ex-proprietary rights which would accrue under the provisions of s. 7 of Act No. XII of 1881. Such an agreement would, in my opinion, defeat the object of that section, which is to prevent a proprietor from divesting himself by his own improvidence of every interest owned by him in his zamindari, and to afford him some protection against the effect of a complete transfer of his rights therein. No doubt an ex-proprietary tenant, like any other occupancy tenant, is competent to relinquish his ex-proprietary rights after he has acquired them; but an agreement to relinquish in the future the [225] ex-proprietary rights which would be acquired after the transfer of his proprietary rights is virtually an agreement to transfer the ex-proprietary rights. Such an agreement is within the prohibition of s. 9 of Act No. XII of 1881. The agreement in question, therefore, is one forbidden by law, and is also of such a nature that, if permitted, it would defeat the provisions of law. The object of the agreement is consequently unlawful under s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act, and the agreement is void. This case may be distinguished from that of Gaya Singh v. Udit

Singh (1), as it appears from the judgment of one of the learned Judges that in that case a relinquishment had already taken place, and it was on that ground that it seems the relinquishment was upheld. If, however, it was intended to hold in that case that every agreement to relinquish an ex-proprietary holding in the future is a valid agreement, I must say with due deference that I am unable to agree with that view. Such an agreement, if sustained, would certainly defeat the object of s. 7, and would be resorted to as a device for evading the operation of that section. It has been said that in this case the object of s. 7 would not be defeated, as the defendant was to get, and has already obtained, the sir lands of the plaintiffs. But it must be borne in mind that it is extremely doubtful whether the land which was once the sir of the plaintiffs would be sir land in the hands of the defendant, within the meaning of sir land as defined in Act No. XII of 1881. I am accordingly of opinion that the agreement relied upon by the plaintiffs is void under s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act and cannot be enforced, and on these grounds the claim for possession of the lands which were once the sir of the defendant must fail. I may observe that the plaintiffs have failed to make out any case in respect of their claim for the lands in the village Ahraula which has fallen to the share of the defendant under the partition.

As for the claim to which relief (3) of the plaint relates, the appeal must, for the reasons given by my brother Aikman, be sustained.

[226] I agree in the decree proposed by my brother Aikman.

BLAIR, J.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a one-half share in certain zamindari villages, and the defendant was the owner of the other half share. A deed of partition was executed by the parties and registered, the effect of which was that, instead of their half shares in the zamindari villages, each party should become sole proprietor of certain of the villages and abandon in consideration all right to those allotted to the other. In two villages, one of which was allotted in the deed of partition to the plaintiffs and one to the defendant, there was certain land theretofore held by the parties respectively as sir, with houses thereon. One of the terms of the agreement was that "the sir lands and the houses of a party situated in a village shall go to the other party's share along with the village in which they are situated; consequently the party who will get possession of the village shall be considered, by reason of its falling to his lot, to be the proprietor of the sir lands and the houses also situate in such village. Should any party fail to give up possession of the houses and the sir lands, the proprietor of the village shall have the said person's possession removed from the houses and the sir lands." The defendant entered on the possession of the village or villages assigned to him. He also took possession of the sir and house appurtenant thereto and which had been relinquished by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs took possession of the zamindari property allotted to them, but the defendant refused to give up to them the possession of the sir and house which formed part of such zamindari property, claiming to be entitled to continue in occupation as ex-proprietary tenant. This suit is brought to recover possession of such sir and house in accordance with the terms of the deed of partition, and for certain subsidiary reliefs. The defendant sets up in his defence his right of occupancy as an ex-proprietary tenant, within the meaning of s. 7 of Act No. XII of 1881. That section is couched in the following terms:—

"Every person who may hereafter lose or part with his proprietary rights in any mahal shall have a right of occupancy [227] in the land held by him as sir in such mahal at the date of such loss or parting, at a rent which shall be four annas in the rupee less than the prevailing rate payable by tenants-at-will for land of similar quality and with similar advantages.

"Persons having such rights of occupancy shall be called ex-proprietary tenants and shall have all the rights of occupancy tenants."

The section in express terms applies to every person who "shall lose or part with his proprietary rights." Indeed I am unable to suggest any form of dispossession, voluntary or involuntary, which those terms are not large enough to cover. It is the contention of the defendant that a contract to abandon his right of occupancy as an ex-proprietary tenant conferred by that section is illegal and unenforceable in law. That he did so promise in the partition agreement seems beyond doubt, and also that such promise made by him formed an integral and inseparable part of the consideration for the reciprocal promises of the plaintiffs. I do not think there is any conflict of opinion as to whether there has been, as a matter of fact, any abandonment or relinquishment by the defendant of his ex-proprietary rights. Indeed the suit is brought upon the basis of a possession admitted and justified by himself. The only question now at issue is whether the provisions of s. 7 and s. 9 of Act No. XII of 1881 are a bar to the maintenance of this suit. If the words of s. 7 are to be taken in their simple and natural meaning, they clearly include, without any distinction whatever, all alienations of whatsoever nature. Upon this construction I fail to see any ground for distinction between alienation by partition and voluntary alienation by sale, or by exchange, or by proceedings in invitum conducted in execution of a decree. The words "proprietary rights" include the rights of a shareholder as well as those of a single exclusive owner. Nor does it appear to me that the nature of the consideration affects the applicability of the section. The zamindar is equally a person who "may lose or part with his proprietary rights" in a mahal, whether the consideration for the alienation be [228] money, land in some other mahal or some other person's share in a mahal. The result would be precisely the same in all cases. He would, but for the operation of s. 7, have denuded himself of all interest in the mahal, and, if the land or share parted with or lost was spread over a score of mahals, in each one the right of ex-proprietary tenancy in relation to the sir therein would at once arise. This seems to me to be the plain and obvious construction of plain words, the comprehensiveness and generality of which I cannot doubt were deliberately intended by the Legislature. In my opinion the onus of establishing an unexpressed exception to the wide language of the section lies upon those who contend for such an exception. On behalf of the respondents I understand it to be urged that provisions in relation to partition do not lie within the scope and purview of the Rent Act, and do lie within the scope and purview of the Land Revenue Act, No. XIX of 1873, as amended. The object of the Rent Act is, generally speaking, to define and control the rights and remedies of landlords and tenants arising out of that relation. The creation of a new relation of landlord and tenant arising from expropriation would be apparently as much within the scope of that Act, whether such expropriation arose through voluntary partition, or through sale or execution proceedings. In the same way the Land Revenue Act in its provisions in respect of partition deals with the duties of revenue officers therein engaged in the formation of areas for the collection of revenue and the re-arrangements of such areas consequent upon and rendered necessary by partitions. All the sections on the subject, from s. 108 of Act No. XIX of 1873 up to and exclusive of s. 125, deal with partitions effected by the Revenue officers, and appear to me to exclude partitions effected solely by the private consent of the parties. The words of that latter section limit its application to land "assigned on partition and with the consent of the co-sharer." The section then, dealing with land the subject both of such assignment and of such consent shall be held by the co-sharer as an occupancy tenant. That is not a general enactment of the status of the [229] cultivating co-sharer on partition, and does not in my opinion apply to any case in which the partition is not effected by the revenue officers. If this interpretation of s. 125 be correct, then I am unaware of any extant provision of law defining the status of a person, who, by private and voluntary partition, has divested himself of his proprietary rights in the sir of which before partition he was a co-sharer, unless it be s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act. I hardly think it possible to contend that a co-sharer in effecting a voluntary partition may wholly, unreservedly and absolutely part with his proprietary right, while in the case of partition by authority the law reserves for him an inalienable right of occupancy. That seems to me to involve a much graver anomaly than to suppose that the Legislature intended by s. 125 of the Land Revenue Act to differentiate the status of a co-sharer proceeding in partition by means of the revenue officers from that of an ex-proprietary tenant created by s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act. If this section of the Rent Act does not apply to voluntary partitions it would then be possible for two co-sharers to partition the property in such a way that the sir would remain entirely with one co-sharer, while the other would possess a zamindari property which he might himself alienate, or of which he might be deprived in execution of a decree without retaining a single particle of interest in it. To prevent such a consummation was in my judgment the object of the Legislature in calling into existence the ex-proprietary tenant. The opinion which I have formed as to the inclusion in s. 7 of the Rent Act of expropriation by partition is largely based upon the consideration that the joint possession of land by joint families is the normal and characteristic type of proprietary possession among Hindus. The numerical importance of and the extent of property held by that constituent of the population seems to me to exclude the suggestion that the every day method of redistribution by partition should have been entirely outside the purview of the Legislature when it enacted s. 7 of the Rent Act. It seems to me that [230] nothing short of express words, excluding or excepting expropriation by partition from the scope and operation of the section, would justify us in declining to apply it to the present case. I would hold, therefore, that the contract between the parties by which each promised to divest himself of all right of occupancy in the sir is in respect to that promise unenforceable in law. The result is that I would allow the appeal and dismiss the suit of the plaintiff, except as to the sum of Rs. 287-8-0, but without costs. I would give the plaintiffs their costs in proportion to their success in both Courts.

BURKITT, J:—There can be no doubt that the wording of s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act is sufficiently wide to include the present case. I nevertheless entertained great doubts as to whether the Legislature had in its contemplation the case of a transfer by partition. I have, however, (though with no little hesitation), come to the conclusion that my doubts were not well founded, and I concur with the remainder of the Court in holding that the appellant did acquire the status of an ex-proprietary tenant in the sir land formerly his, which is now included in the village wholly transferred under the partition to the respondents. I have come to this conclusion with the greatest reluctance because of the glaringly dishonest manner in which the appellant acted towards the respondents. I concur in the judgment just delivered by my brothers Knox and Banerji.

AIKMAN, J.—The parties to this suit, or their predecessors in title, were joint owners of several villages in the Basti and Gorakhpur districts. On the 20th of May 1891, they entered into an arrangement by which this joint ownership was put an end to, each party taking certain villages in sole proprietorship. It was agreed between them that, if either party had sir land in any village which fell to the lot of the other, the sir land was to be relinquished by the party to whom it had belonged. The plaintiffs owned sir land in a village named Sehri, which village fell to the defendant's lot. The plaintiffs carried out their part of the bargain by surrendering to the defendant possession of [231] this sir land. A village named Barghat, in which the defendant owned sir land, fell to the plaintiff's lot, but the defendant, although, as said above, he had got from the plaintiffs the sir land in the village of Sehri, with singular bad faith refused to carry out his part of the bargain by resigning to the plaintiffs the sir land in Barghat. The plaintiffs accordingly brought this suit to recover possession of this sir land and mesne profits for the time during which possession had been withheld. The lower Court has given the plaintiffs a decree, from which the defendant has appealed. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the bargain which the plaintiffs seek to enforce is one which the Courts cannot, with reference to the provisions of s. 23 of the Contract Act, give effect to. I have reluctantly come to the conclusion that this contention must be sustained. The defendant was at one time joint owner with the plaintiffs in the village of Barghat. The partition deed shows that the whole of that village was transferred to the plaintiffs; consequently the defendant by that partition lost or parted with the proprietary rights which he formerly had in the village. He therefore, under the provisions of s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act, 1881, at once acquired a right of occupancy in the sir lands he held in the village and became an ex-proprietary tenant thereof.

It would be absurd to hold that an ex-proprietary tenant cannot, if he chooses, relinquish his tenancy in sir land after he has by virtue of s. 7 acquired a right of occupancy in it. To hold otherwise would be to convert him into a serf attached to the soil, and would moreover be in contravention of s. 31 of the Rent Act, which gives a right of relinquishment to all tenants not holding under a lease. But the question we have to consider is:—Can a Court enforce specific performance of a contract, such as that on which the plaintiff relies, to relinquish a right of occupancy which is created and conferred by s. 7 of the Rent Act? In my opinion this question must be answered in the negative. It is true that a contrary view appears to [232] have been taken in Gaya Singh v. Udit Singh (1), and the performance of a similar contract enforced. But, with all respect to the learned Judges who decided that case, I am of opinion that they overlooked the difficulty created by reading

s. 23 of the Contract Act in the light of s. 7 and s. 9 of the Rent Act. In the course of the argument in this case, it was contended that s. 7 of the Rent Act was never intended to apply to a case like the present. The defendant's case here undoubtedly falls within the four corners of s. 7. If I could find any clear indication that it was not the intention of the Legislature that s. 7 should apply to a case like the present, I would be only too glad to give effect to the respondent's contention. But I can find none. In supporting this contention much reliance was placed upon s. 125 of the North-Western Provinces Land Revenue Act, 1873, the second paragraph of which provides that where, in carrying out a partition, the sir land of one co-sharer has been included in the mahal assigned to another co-sharer, the former shall be an occupancy tenant of the land. The Legislature recognizes a distinction between an ex-proprietary tenant and occupancy tenant. See s. 10 of the Rent Act. Now if s. 125 of the Revenue Act had provided that the co-sharer whose sir was transferred in effecting a partition was to be an ex-proprietary tenant, there would have been some force in the contention that s. 7 was not intended to cover cases of partition, as, if s. 7 were intended to be of general application, such a provision as that contained in the second paragraph of s. 125 of Act No. XIX of 1873 would have been unnecessary. But there is nothing to show that the second paragraph of s. 125 was not intended to be an exception to the general rule. If it be held, as I think it must be, that the appellant by the arrangement come to on the 20th of May 1891, became an ex-proprietary tenant of his sir land in the village in which, by that arrangement, he parted with his proprietary rights, it would, I hold entirely defeat the provisions of s. 7 and s. 9 [233] of the Rent Act were a Court to enforce a contract to surrender the occupancy rights so acquired. If such contracts were enforced, the beneficent provisions of s. 7 of the Rent Act would, I fear, be rendered almost entirely nugatory.

For the above reasons I am of opinion that that portion of the decree of the lower Court awarding to the plaintiffs possession of the sir land in mauza Barghat and mesne profits thereof should be set aside. The plaintiffs also sued to recover possession of sir land in another village named Ahraula. In their plaint they make out no cause of action as to the sir land of this village. An inspection of the partition proceedings shows that, with the exception of a plot of 144 bighas, the whole of Ahraula was assigned to the defendant. There is nothing to show that the clause in the agreement of the 20th of May 1891, on which the plaintiffs rely, applies in the case of Ahraula. On this ground alone the claim as regards Ahraula ought to have been dismissed. But if the clause did apply, it was, as in the case of the Barghat sir, a contract which tended to defeat the provisions of s. 7 of the Rent Act, and which cannot therefore be enforced. The above findings dispose of the first five grounds in the memorandum of appeal. The last ground refers to a portion of the plaintiffs' claim in which they sought to recover money they had paid out for the defendant. The defendant put in a counter claim on account of a bond payable by the plaintiffs which the defendant had discharged. The Court below gave the defendant credit for the amount he had paid to the extent of the principal money secured by the bond and interest for one year, but refused to allow the defendant credit for the amount he had paid as post diem interest, holding that this was not recoverable under the bond. With reference to the terms of the bond and the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in the recent case, Mathura Das v. Raja Narindar Bahadur Pal (1), post diem interest was due under the bond. The defendant was therefore entitled to credit for the sum he paid on that account. [234] When credit is given him for this, the amount due to the plaintiffs is reduced to Rs. 287-8-0. The result of the above findings is that the plaintiffs' suit for possession of the sir land and mesne profits should be dismissed, and a decree passed for Rs. 287-8-0, instead of Rs. 3009-8-0, with costs proportionate to their success.

I would allow the appeal and vary the decree of the lower Court as set forth above. But to mark our sense of the bad faith displayed by the defendant, I would not allow him any costs here or in the Court below.

BY THE COURT.—The appeal is allowed; the decree of the lower Court is varied, and the plaintiffs' suit dismissed, except as regards the sum of Rs. 287-8-0. The plaintiffs will get costs in this Court and the Court below proportionate to their success. The defendant will pay his own costs throughout.

Maha-brahmans—Agreement as to distribution of offerings—Contract—Cause of action.

Amongst the Maha-brahmans of a particular village an agreement obtained that some of them should collect and receive offerings during certain months; that during those months the others should refrain from receiving any offerings, and that in certain other months the other Maha-brahmans should collect and receive the offerings and they should refrain from collecting offerings.

Held, that this was a good agreement and sufficient to support an action for damages by the persons entitled to the offerings in a particular month as against the persons who had received those offerings contrary to the agreement.

[R., 5 O.C. 225.]

THIS was a suit of the nature of a suit for damages for breach of contract. The parties to the suit were Maha-brahmans. The plaintiffs' case was as follows:—They alleged that at a time long anterior to suit an arrangement had been come to amongst the [235] Maha-brahmans of Mainpuri by which each of them took it in turn to receive the offerings made on an ekadasha (eleventh day ceremony), that is to say, if such a ceremony took place during the turn of a particular Maha-brahman the offerings made were taken by him. The turn of the plaintiffs' maternal grandfather as Maha-brahman fell in the months of Jeth, Bhadon, Aghan and Phagun, and he used to receive the Maha-brahman's dues in respect of any ekadasha occurring during those days. After his death his widow Mithua continued to receive the dues which had fallen to his share. By a deed of gift of the 9th of December 1885 she gave that right of a Maha-brahman to the plaintiffs who held it since then. The plaintiffs further alleged that in the village of Deopura, which is attached to Mainpuri, one Thakur Tribhawn Singh died, and his ekadasha was performed on the 8th Jeth Badi, Sambat 1953, corresponding to the 5th of May 1895. That day belonged to the plaintiffs' turn as Maha-brahmans, but the defendants took without any right the offerings made on that occasion to the value of some Rs. 200. The plaintiffs therefore sued to recover the offerings or their value.

The defendants pleaded, inter alia, that such a suit would not lie.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Mainpuri) upheld this contention and dismissed the suit on the ground that it was not cognizable by a Civil Court.

The plaintiffs appealed. The lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri) held that the suit would lie, and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order the defendants appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.:—The plaintiffs sued the defendants to recover money and offerings received by the defendants in breach of an agreement between the parties. The parties were Maha-brahmans, and it is alleged that an agreement [236] had been come to between the predecessors of the parties, the effect of which now, as applied to the present parties, is that the plaintiffs should collect and receive offerings during certain months; that during those months the defendants should refrain from receiving any offerings, and that in certain other months the defendants should collect and receive the offerings and the plaintiffs should refrain from collecting offerings. The first Court dismissed the suit on the ground that such a suit would not lie. The second Court set aside the decree of the first Court, and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order of remand, this appeal has been brought.

In the course of the argument we have been referred to Doorga Parshad v. Budree (1); Lala v. Guneshee (2); Durga Prasad v. Genda (3); Jhummun Pandey v. Dinoo Nath Pandey (4); Har Lall v. Jeorakhun Lall (5); Deonath v. Mussumat Gunneyshee (6); Bindhu Lal v. Sampat Misr (7) and Muddun Mohan Ghossal v. Nuboram Chuckerbutty (8).

Few of these authorities have any bearing on this case. The decisions in others of them, so far as they would apply here, were obiter. This suit is based on an alleged contract, which of course must be proved. For present purposes, and those only, we assume that the alleged contract can be proved. It is not against public policy that such a contract should be entered into, and we know no reason in law which would make such a contract bad. The cause of action would apparently be for damages for breach of the contract. The measure of these damages probably would be the amount proved to have been received by the defendants in breach of the contract. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

A zamindar applied to a Revenue officer to commute the rent hitherto paid in kind by certain of his tenants to a fixed money rent to be paid in future. The Assistant Collector made the order asked for and fixed the money rent to be paid in future. After that order had been made the zamindar brought a suit for arrears of rent against the tenants in a Court of Revenue and obtained a decree for rent at the rate which had been fixed by the order of the Assistant Collector. Against this decree the tenants did not appeal, and it became final. The decree was put into execution: property of the tenants was attached and sold, and the decree was partially satisfied out of the sale proceeds. Subsequently to the passing of the decree for rent, the Board of Revenue set aside the order of the Assistant Collector commuting the rent in kind to a fixed money rent. The tenants thereupon sued to recover compensation on account of the sale of their property under the decree for rent.

The plaintiffs were occupancy tenants of the defendants of some 20 bighas and 6 biswas of land in the town of Meerut. The plaintiffs used to pay their rent in kind. The defendant sued them for enhancement of rent (describing his suit as one for determination of the rent payable by the plaintiffs) and got a decree on the 13th of September 1889. This decree was set aside by the Board of Revenue on appeal on the 14th of October 1890. Between the 13th of September 1889 and the 14th of October, 1890, the defendant sued the plaintiffs for rent at the enhanced rate allowed by the decree of the 13th of September 1889 and got [238] a decree for Rs. 1,960-2-0 on the 18th June 1890. Notwithstanding the order of the Board of Revenue of the 14th of October, 1890, the defendant executed his decree for rent and realized Rs. 1,010.

The plaintiffs sued for cancelment of the decree of the 18th of June 1890 and the case went up to the Board of Revenue on appeal. The Board held that the decree of the 18th of June 1890 could not be cancelled by them and directed the plaintiffs to seek their remedy in the Civil Court. The plaintiffs accordingly brought a suit for a declaration that the decree of the 18th of June was incapable of execution; but their suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge on the 28th of September 1893.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought the present suit in which they claimed to recover the amount realized in execution of the decree of

JUDGMENT.

[239] EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—The plaintiffs, who are respondents here, brought their suit against their landlord, who was the zamindar, the appellant here, to recover compensation for their property which was sold in execution of a decree for rent made by a competent Court. The first Court dismissed the suit, holding that the suit did not lie. The Court of first appeal set aside the decree of the first Court and made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure.
From that order this appeal has been brought.

The facts of this case are these:—The zamindar applied to a revenue officer to commute the rent theretofore paid by these plaintiffs as his tenants in kind to a fixed money rent to be paid in future. The Assistant Collector made the order, and fixed the money rent to be paid in future. After that order had been made, the zamindar brought a suit for arrears of rent against his tenants, these plaintiffs, in the Court of Revenue and obtained a decree for rent at the rate which had been fixed by the order of the Assistant Collector. That decree was put in execution; property of these plaintiffs appellants was attached and sold, and the decree was partially satisfied out of the sale proceeds. This suit is brought to recover the money so realized, the Board of Revenue having, before the commencement of this suit and subsequently to the passing of the decree for rent, set aside the order commuting the rent in kind into a fixed money rent.

For the defendant appellant reliance has been placed on the principle of the decision in Marriot v. Hampton (1), and it has been contended that, as the Board of Revenue had not jurisdiction to interfere in appeal or otherwise with the decree for rent, the decision of their Lordships of the Privy Council in Shama Parshad Roy Chowdhery v. Hurro Parshad Roy Chowdhery (2), the decision of the majority of the Full Bench of the High Court at Calcutta in Jogesh Chunder Dutt v. Kali Churn Dutt (3) and of the Calcutta Court in Raja Nilmoney Singh Deo Bahadoor v.
[240] Sharoda Parshad Mookerjee (4) did not apply, as in all these cases the Court which passed a subsequent decree, which had the effect of reversing or superseding the decree under which the money was paid which was sought to be recovered, had jurisdiction over the suit in which such last mentioned decree was made.

On the other hand for the plaintiffs respondents it has been contended that the setting aside in revision by the Board of Revenue of the order of the Assistant Collector commuting the rent in kind into a fixed money rent had the effect of superseding the decree for rent of the Court of Revenue, as that decree was based on the order of the Assistant Collector commuting the rent.

As a matter of fact it is questionable whether in this case the Assistant Collector had any jurisdiction to make his order commuting the rent in kind to a fixed money rent. The Board of Revenue had absolute jurisdiction in revision over that order of the Assistant Collector. The decree for rent made by the Court of Revenue being for a sum exceeding Rs. 100 was one over which the Board of Revenue had no jurisdiction of any kind, and was one the appeal from which lay exclusively to the District Judge. No appeal in fact was made from the decree for rent. It appears to us that their Lordships of the Privy Council, in the case which was before them and to which we have referred, when speaking of a decree being reversed or superseded, were, as to reversal certainly, speaking of reversal by a competent Court, and as to supersession were referring to such supersession as had taken place in the case before them. That was a case in which the money sought to be recovered had been paid under decrees which were based solely on a decree between the same parties which was subsequently reversed by their Lordships of the Privy Council. We think the supersession to which their Lordships were referring must have been a superseding by a decree of a Court which had competent jurisdiction to reverse the decree under which the money had been paid, if it had been brought before them. It is quite plain to our minds that if there had been no order made [241] at all for a commutation of the rent in kind into a fixed money rent, but a Court of Revenue had erroneously made a decree for a money rent and that decree was executed and was not reversed in appeal or superseded by a Court competent to reverse it, a tenant whose goods had been sold in execution of such decree for rent or who had satisfied that decree by payment, could not recover so long as the decree for rent was not reversed or superseded by a Court competent in that respect. The defendants had a remedy against this decree for rent, and that was by appealing. Of that remedy they did not avail themselves, and it may be observed that, as the Assistant Collector apparently acted without jurisdiction in making his order of commutation, the defendants had a good ground of appeal. The fact that the order of the Board of Revenue in revision set aside the order of the Assistant Collector commuting the rent cannot, in our opinion, put the plaintiffs in a better position than they would have been in, if, as we think is probable, the Assistant Collector had no jurisdiction to make the order of commutation. In our opinion, as the decree of the Court of Revenue stands unreversed and not superseded by a competent Court, this suit must fail. We allow this appeal with costs in this Court and in the Court below, and, setting aside the order under appeal, we dismiss the appeal to the Court of first appeal and restore and affirm the decree of the first Court.

Appeal decreed.

Held that there was nothing to preclude the vendee from suing in a Civil Court for a declaration that the said agreement was void and [242] unenforceable and had been extorted from him by undue influence. Mahesh Rai v. Chandar Rai (1), Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai (2) and Husain Shah v. Gopal Rai (3) referred to.

THE facts of this case are fully stated in the judgment of the Court. Mr. W. Wallach and Munshi Badri Das, for the appellant. Maulvi Ghulam Muftaba, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

AIKMAN, J.—On the 18th January 1893, the appellant Daulat Ram purchased from the respondent Anwar Husen his proprietary rights in a certain village. On the following day Anwar Husen executed in favour of Daulat Ram a kabuliat by which he undertook to hold his sir land as a tenant of Daulat Ram, for a term of three years, at a rental of Rs. 175, and then surrender it. It is found that the rental entered in the kabuliat is far in excess of the rate Anwar Husen would have been bound to pay under the provisions of s. 7 of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act. The object of the agreement on the face of it was clearly to defeat the provisions of that section, and the agreement was therefore, under the provisions of s. 23 of the Indian Contract Act, unlawful and void. In the following year Daulat Ram sued Anwar Husen to recover rent at the rate agreed upon. The suit was dismissed by the Assistant Collector, but on appeal was decreed by the then District Judge of Mainpuri. I must express my surprise that the District Judge should have given effect to an agreement, the object of which was so clearly unlawful. To the suit for the arrears of rent the defendant Anwar Husen pleaded—"that the kabuliat was unenforceable, as having been extorted from him by undue influence for an exorbitant rent." In his judgment the District Judge said:—"I think that the question as to whether it (that is, the kabuliat) was executed under pressure of undue influence cannot be properly decided in the present suit. If the respondent wishes to have it set aside he can sue in the Civil Court." On the 19th of September 1895, Anwar Husen instituted the suit out of which this appeal arises. [243] He asks for two reliefs, first; that the kabuliat and the decree passed by the Revenue Court on the basis of the said kabuliat might be cancelled and held unenforceable; secondly, that a sum of Rs. 418-10-0, being a balance alleged to be due out of the price of his zamindari estate, should be awarded to him. The Court of first instance, the Munsif of Etah, gave the plaintiff a decree for Rs. 100 under the second relief set forth above and dismissed the rest of the claim. On appeal, the District Judge gave the plaintiff a decree cancelling the kabuliat and declaring it inoperative. Quoad ultra the decision of the Munsif was affirmed. The defendant Daulat Ram comes here in second appeal and impugns the decree of the lower appellate Court on two grounds. First, that the claim for the cancellation of the kabuliat was barred by s. 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and secondly, that the claim for the cancellation of the kabuliat was not cognizable by the Civil Court. The appellant's case has been ably argued by the learned counsel who appears in support of the appeal, but after full consideration I have come to the conclusion that the appeal must fail.

The lower Court has decreed the cancellation of the kabuliat on several grounds, one being that it was extorted from the plaintiff by undue influence. With reference to the extract from the previous judgment which has been set forth above, I cannot hold that the issue as to whether the kabuliat was obtained through undue influence was heard and finally decided in the previous suit.

In support of the second ground of appeal the learned counsel relies on two Full Bench decisions of this Court, i.e., Mahesh Rai v. Chandar Rai(1) and Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai(2). For the respondent reliance is placed on a decision of this Court in Husain Shah v. Gopal Rai (3). If the cases relied on by the learned counsel for the appellant are in point I am of course bound to follow them and sustain the appellant's contention, but I think the cases are distinguishable from the [244] present case. In the first case a Revenue Court had held that the defendants were occupancy tenants; the plaintiffs brought a suit in a Civil Court asking for a declaration that the judgment of the Revenue Court in so far as it was injurious to the plaintiff's rights might be declared as set aside and of no effect, and that it should be decided that the defendant's possession was that of sub-tenants. This was clearly a suit of which the cognizance was barred by s. 95, clause (a) of the North-Western Provinces Rent Act. In the second Full Bench case, the Settlement Court had entered the defendants as tenants at fixed rates and the plaintiffs as mortgagees of the holding. The plaintiffs asked for a decree for maintenance of possession "by invalidating the proceeding of filling up the columns at the recent settlement." It was held that if a Civil Court exercised jurisdiction in the case by declaring that the plaintiffs were and the defendants were not the tenants at fixed rates of the holding in question, it would be exercising a jurisdiction which s. 241 of Act No. XIX of 1873 prohibits the Civil Courts from exercising.

In this case it may be true that the ultimate result of the decree which the plaintiff obtained will be that he may, by adopting proper steps, succeed in establishing his status as an ex-proprietary tenant, but the decree as given does not, in my opinion, trench upon the jurisdiction of the Revenue Courts. Suppose that a landholder by duress obliges his tenant to execute a kabuliat for the land which he holds, undertaking to pay an exorbitant rent, the tenant might, it appears to me, wait until he is sued upon the kabuliat and put forward the defence that it had been extorted from him, and in that case it would be incumbent on the Revenue Court to find whether or not the defendant's plea was good. But in my opinion the tenant would not be bound to wait until he was made defendant in a suit for arrears. He might, I hold, bring a suit to have it declared that the kabuliat was not binding upon him. If he could bring such a suit, there is no provision, so far as I can see, in the Rent Act by which a Revenue Court could [245] entertain it; it would necessarily lie, therefore, in the Civil Court. In this case the tenant has executed a kabuliat by which he undertook to surrender the holding after a certain period. It is stated that the landholder has not as yet taken any steps to enforce the agreement to surrender. I am unable to see what there is to prevent the tenant from maintaining the present suit to have it declared that the agreement is not binding upon him. With reference to the fact that, as I read it, the District Judge in his judgment of the 7th of November 1894, refrained from deciding the question as to whether the agreement to pay an enhanced rent had or had not been obtained under pressure of undue influence, there is, in my opinion, no bar to the tenant maintaining this suit for the cancellation of the kabuliat as a whole. In the case relied upon by the respondent it was held that a suit to set aside a perpetual lease of agricultural land on the ground that the word importing perpetuity had been fraudulently inserted in this lease was "peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the Civil Court." I see no reason why this view should not be extended to a suit to set aside a kabuliat on the ground that it had been obtained by undue influence. For the above reasons I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

APPELLATE CIVIL.

Before Sir John Edge, Kt., Chief Justice, and Mr. Justice Burkitt.

ABDUL MAJID KHAN (Defendant) v. KADRI BEGAM
(Plaintiff).^{*} [25th January, 1898.]

Construction of document—Award—Award of the nature of a family settlement directing an annuity to be paid "ta baiyat walidain."

An award drawn by an unprofessional arbitrator in India is not to be construed according to the same principles as an award settled by counsel or a solicitor in England, but in accordance with what may reasonably be supposed under the circumstances of the case to have been the intentions of the arbitrator.

Where an award, which was of the nature of a family settlement between a father, mother and son, of certain property which had been given by the father to the mother in lieu of dower and then by the mother to the son, directed that a certain annuity should be paid out of the property to the father [246] and mother "ta baiyat walidain," it was held that the annuity was to be paid during the joint lives of the father and mother and also during the life of the survivor.

THIS appeal arose out of a suit to recover money in virtue of an award. The plaintiff was the widow of one Nawab Rashid Khan, and the defendant Abdul Majid Khan was her son. Rashid Khan had assigned certain property to his wife, the plaintiff, in lieu of her dower, and she during his minority made a gift of the property so assigned to the defendant. Subsequently the defendant apparently showed a disposition to become extravagant, and thereupon the father, mother and son agreed that a settlement of the property should be made through an arbitrator. An arbitrator was appointed and made his award on the 7th of February

* Appeal No. 27 of 1897, under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

1885, which award was subsequently registered. By this award it was provided that the defendant should pay out of the property the subject of the award Rs. 600 yearly to his father and mother; and it was provided that his payment should be made "ta haiyat walidain," which is, literally translated, "to the term of the lives of the two parents." The annuity was duly paid during the lifetime of the father and for a short period after his death. Subsequently, however, the defendant ceased paying anything to his mother, who accordingly sued to recover a certain instalment of the annuity by sale of the property in question.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Bareilly) gave the plaintiff a decree for half the amount of her claim, which decree was in substance affirmed by the lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Bareilly). The defendant appealed to the High Court, and his appeal coming before a single Judge of the Court was dismissed. From the judgment of the single Judge the defendant appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J. and BURKITT, J.—In this suit Musammat Kadri Begam sues her son, Abdul Majid Khan, on an award, to obtain [247] a decree for sale. The facts of the case are somewhat peculiar. The plaintiff was the wife of one Nawab Rashid Khan, who was the owner of the property sought to be sold. He assigned the property to his wife, the plaintiff, in satisfaction of dower due by him to her, and she during his minority made a gift of the property to the defendant. When the defendant came of age he showed a disposition to be extravagant, and thereupon the father, mother and son agreed that an arbitrator should determine what provision should be made for the family. Now the arbitrator made an award, and upon that award this suit has been brought. He awarded that 600 rupees yearly should be paid out of the property in question to the father and mother, and ordered that the payment should be made "ta haiyat walidain" which has been translated "to the term of the lives of the two parents." Nawab Rashid Khan, the husband, has died, and for some time after his death the money was paid regularly to the mother by the son. He has now, however, taken a different view of his legal and filial duties, and he declines to pay his mother anything. Of course, if in point of law he is not liable to make any payment to his mother, the fact that he is her son and the fact that the property in question belonged to her and that she need not have given it to him cannot impose on him any liability in law to make any payment of the kind. It has been contended that the arbitrator intended by his award that this annual payment of Rs. 600 should be made for the joint lives only of the father and mother, and that after the death of either the son should be under no obligation to make any payment to the survivor. It is difficult to conceive that the arbitrator, who at the time was carrying out the wishes of the family, should have entertained any such intention. It is difficult to understand how he could have intended that on the mother's death the father should be left penniless by his dutiful son. And if that was not his intention in the case of the mother dying and the father surviving, his intention must have been that the money should be paid during the joint lives of the father and mother and during the lifetime [248] of the survivor. There is no doubt that the language used in the award is somewhat ambiguous, and we were pressed by Mr. Ryves with the decision of Kindersley, V. C., in Grant v. Winbolt (1). In that case the Vice-Chancellor arrived with great difficulty at the conclusion which he expressed. We have not to construe this award as we should have to construe an award settled by counsel or a solicitor in England, but as an award drawn by a plain man of Bareilly, probably of no great business habits, who would know little or nothing about the subtleties of the English system of conveyancing. We have to construe it as we think it was intended by the arbitrator it should be construed, and we hold that it was his intention that the liability to make the payment should continue during the life of the survivor of the parents.

We have said this was a suit for sale. A decree for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act was made, treating the award as if it were a mortgage or document creating a charge upon land. It does not appear from anything put before us that the arbitrator had any power to charge the lands in question: consequently a decree for sale was bad. However, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for money. We set aside the decree for sale, and we give the plaintiff a decree for the Rs. 600 (six hundred) annuity for the year in question, together with interest from the date of suit until realisation at 12 per cent. per annum. We also give her her costs of this appeal.

To the extent above indicated we modify the decree below. In other respects we dismiss the appeal.

Land holder and tenant—Rights of zamindars in land forming part of the abadi—Custom—Customary law of the North-Western Provinces.

According to the general custom prevalent in the North-Western Provinces, a person, agriculturist or agricultural tenant, who is allowed by a zamindar [249] to build a house for his occupation in the abadi, obtains, if there is no special contract to the contrary, a mere right to use that house for himself and his family so long as he maintains the house, that is, prevents it falling down, and so long as he does not abandon the house by leaving the village. As such occupier of a house in the abadi occupying under the zamindar, he has, unless he has obtained by special grant from the zamindar an interest which he can sell, no interest which he can sell by private sale or which can be sold in execution of a decree against him, except his interest in the timber, roofing and wood-work of the house. *Narain Prasad v. THE facts of this case are as follows:—

The plaintiff came into Court alleging that about twenty-six years previously one Nand Kishore had received from his, the plaintiff's agent, permission to build a house on a piece of land in the village of which the plaintiff was zamindar, on the condition that it should be inhabited by Nand Kishore and his heirs, and alleging further that the house which was built could not legally be transferred. The plaintiff also relied upon a clause in the wajib-ul-arz. The house so built by Nand Kishore was sold in execution of a decree against a son of Nand Kishore and purchased by one Chote Lal. The plaintiff zamindar asked for a declaration of his right to the land on which the house stood. Further that he should be put in possession of that land, the auction-purchaser being ordered to remove the materials of the house, or if the Court saw fit, being ordered to receive from the plaintiff the value of those materials.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Muttra) gave the plaintiff a decree declaring (what was never seriously contested) that the site of the house had not been and could not be sold in execution of Chote Lal's decree, and dismissed the rest of the plaintiff's suit. This decree was affirmed on appeal by the Subordinate Judge of Agra.

The plaintiff appealed to the High Court, and his appeal coming before a single Judge was dismissed on the ground that no custom of inalienability or special agreement not to alienate [250] the house had been proved. From this judgment the plaintiff appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—This appeal has arisen in a suit brought by the zamindar against the occupiers of a house in the abadi of his village and against one Chote Lal, who purchased at auction-sale under a decree against the occupiers such rights as the occupiers had in the house. The occupiers made no defence to the suit. Chote Lal only has defended the suit. The plaintiff alleged a special agreement under which the house had been originally built; he also relied upon the wajib-ul-arz. He did not specifically set up in his plaint, or apparently in his argument before our brother Aikman in this Court, the real point on which this case must be decided, and that is that, according to the general and well known custom of these Provinces, a custom so well established that it may be treated as the common law of the Provinces, a person, agriculturist or agricultural tenant, who is allowed by a zamindar to build a house for his occupation in the abadi, obtains, if there is no special contract to the contrary, a mere right to use that house for himself and his family so long as he maintains the house, that is, prevents it falling down, and so long as he does not abandon the house by leaving the village. As such occupier of a house in the abadi occupying under the zamindar, as in this case, he has, unless he has obtained by special grant from the zamindar an interest which he can sell, no interest which he can sell by private sale or which can be sold in execution of a decree against him, except his interest in the timber, roofing and wood-work of the house. There is good reason why such a custom should have grown up and have been established. If it were otherwise, agricultural tenants or cultivators who, for the purposes of the cultivation of the agricultural lands of the village, were permitted by the zamindar to build or occupy a house in the abadi of the particular village might sell the right to occupy the [251] house to some person unconnected with the cultivation of the agricultural land in the village, and thus in course of time the abadi provided and reserved by the zamindar for the use of those cultivating his lands would come to be occupied by persons in no way connected with the cultivation of the agricultural lands in the village. In such a case the zamindar would practically lose his rights in the abadi and would be compelled to restrict the area of culturable land in the village so as to provide sites for fresh houses for agriculturists. It might happen that a purely agricultural village, every single site in the abadi of which belonged to the zamindar solely, might come to be a village, for example, of weavers, who neither paid rent to the zamindar nor promoted the cultivation of the agricultural lands of the village.

It is contended that it was for the plaintiff to prove a special contract. In our opinion the plaintiff had only to rely on the common custom of the Provinces, and it was for the auction-purchaser, who alone defended this suit, to show that there was some special contract between the zamindar and the person of the predecessor of the person whose interest he had bought which created, contrary to the general custom, an interest which might be attached and sold in execution of a decree against the occupier. If the defendant, auction-purchaser, had set up, not a special contract, but a local custom of the village in question by which an occupier of a house in the abadi, holding under no special contract, but merely occupying a house the site of which belonged to the zamindar, could sell his right to occupy or have it sold for him in execution of a decree against him, we should be prepared to hold that such a special custom was bad.

Our attention has been drawn to the decision of the Court Narain Prasad Dammar (1). So far as that decision is based upon an assumption that, apart from special contract, the occupier of a house in the abadi under the zamindar has any interest in the occupancy of that house which can be sold privately or by auction sale we entirely dissent from it. The [252] occupier's right is a mere personal right of residence. The other case to which we have been referred is Chajju Singh v. Kanhia (2). There the Full Bench held that the zamindars of a village are, as a rule and presumably, the owners of all the house sites in the village, and that a house left unoccupied by a tenant lapses to the landlord in the absence of heirs or of other lawful assignees of the last occupier. "Other lawful assignees" must not be understood to mean purchasers by private or auction-sale from such occupier.

Chote Lal, the only defendant defending this suit, has made out no case. This appeal must be allowed. We give the plaintiff a decree declaring that the occupiers of the house had no right, except to the timber, the wood-work and the roofing, which could be sold in execution of a decree against them, that a right to occupy the house was not transferable by sale either private or in execution of a decree, and a decree that the plaintiff be put in possession of the site claimed. Chote Lal will be allowed thirty days from the notification of this decree in the Court below to remove such of the materials of the house as were not part of the land; that is, he cannot remove the walls of the house if they are constructed of soil belonging to the village. We allow this appeal with costs in all Courts.

[N.B.—This is an appeal from a judgment of AIKMAN, J., reported in 19 A. 145.—Ed.]

[253] THE suit out of which this appeal arose was a suit to recover money due under a mortgage-bond held by the plaintiff, dated the 14th of January 1893. The mortgage was for a sum not exceeding Rs. 100, and was not registered. Subsequently to the date of this mortgage the mortgagee sold the mortgaged property by a registered sale deed, dated the 9th January 1895. The defendants to the suit were the mortgagor and the vendees.

The Court of first instance (Munsif of Phaphund) decreed the plaintiff's claim against the mortgagor alone, holding it not established that at the time of the execution of their sale-deed the vendees had notice of the prior unregistered mortgage.

The plaintiff appealed, and the Lower Appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Mainpuri), finding that the vendees had in fact had notice of the plaintiff's mortgage and therefore could not claim priority under s. 50 of Act No. III of 1877, decreed the plaintiff's claim also as against the defendants vendees.

The defendants vendees appealed to the High Court, and their appeal coming before a single Judge of the Court was dismissed (see I.L.R., 19 All., p. 145). From that judgment the defendants vendees appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Madho Prasad, for the appellant.

Mr. Muhammad Ishaq Khan, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—In this case it is contended in appeal that the holder of a registered deed of sale of immoveable property who, at the time of the making of his contract of sale, had notice of a prior unregistered mortgage, which did not require registration, was entitled to priority by reason of s. 50 of the Indian Registration Act, 1877, over the holder of the unregistered mortgage. The rule of equity on this subject which has always been followed in this Court has been applied by our brother Aikman in the decree from which this appeal has been brought. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

JUDGMENT.

BLAIR, J.—This is a plaintiff's second appeal. His suit has been dismissed by the Court of first instance and also by the Lower Appellate Court. The suit was brought to set aside an auction-sale which had taken place in execution of a decree in a suit for sale. The point raised in appeal is that the Courts below were wrong in holding that ss. 244 and 13 of the Code of Civil Procedure bar the suit.

In the course of the proceedings in execution the parties agreed to refer their differences to arbitration and to abide by the award which should be made. Such an award was made, but it was not certified to the executing Court, as required by s. 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The execution was proceeded with in spite of objection taken, and the property was sold and bought [255] in by the decree-holder. The judgment-debtor in that suit is the plaintiff and appellant here.

An argument has been addressed to us on behalf of the appellant based upon the amendment of s. 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure made by the Civil Procedure Code Amendment Act of 1888. The words in the Act of 1882 were—"No such payment or adjustment shall be recognized by any Court unless it has been certified as aforesaid." In the amending Act the substituted words are:—"Unless such a payment or adjustment has been certified as aforesaid, it shall not be recognized as a payment or adjustment of the decree by any Court executing the decree." The argument was that it was a reasonable inference to draw from the words of limitation imported by the amendment that the Legislature did not intend to exclude the recognition of payments of adjustments by Courts other than those executing the decree in question. My attention has been called to sundry cases, two of which have been the subject of decision in these Provinces. The first is the case of Shadi v. Ganga Sahai (1). In that case a payment had been made by a judgment-debtor in satisfaction of a decree, but such payment had not been notified to the executing Court. The Court proceeded to execute the decree on the application of the decree-holder. The judgment-debtor then brought a regular suit to recover the money which he had paid to put an end to the execution proceedings. It was held that the suit could be maintained. But the reliefs asked for in that suit contained no prayer asking that the execution proceedings in the prior suit should be set aside or otherwise interfered with. That case is therefore in a very material particular distinguishable from the one with which we are now dealing. In another case Kalyan Singh v. Kamta Prasad (2) it was held by a single Judge that a suit would lie in the following circumstances. Pending the execution of a decree an adjustment by transfer of some trees to the decree-holder had been made, but not certified. In a later suit brought by another plaintiff against the same judgment-debtor, [256] it was sought in execution to attach the trees in question. The decree-holder in the previous suit objected that the trees were his by virtue of the uncertified adjustment. The objection being disallowed, the objector brought a regular suit to establish his right to the trees. It was held that the suit was maintainable. In this case also no setting aside or modification of execution proceedings in the first suit was asked for. Two cases have, however, been cited for the appellant which appear to be authorities in favour of his contention. In the case of Ishan Chunder Bandopadhyaya v. Indro Narain Gossami (3) and in the case of Pat Dasi v. Sharup Chand Mala (4), suits to set aside execution proceedings in the course of which adjustments had been made, but not certified, were held maintainable. In my opinion the decisions in those cases cannot now be held to be law. They are disposed of by the decision of the Privy Council in Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal (5). The suit in that case was a suit to have set aside a sale in execution proceedings of certain zamindari, on the allegation that the decree-holder had made with certain co-sharers in the zamindari an agreement that their shares should be exempted in execution. The agreement was not notified to the executing Court, and those shares were sold. In appeal in a suit to set aside the sale the Committee of the Privy Council held that s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure barred the plaintiff's suit, inasmuch as the question which had arisen was a question arising between the parties to the suit in which the decree was passed within the true intent and meaning of s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The decision of their Lordships was followed by a majority of the Judges who decided the case of Azizan v. Matuk Lal Sahu (6). In my opinion, the ruling of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Prosunno Kumar Sanyal v. Kali Das Sanyal governs this case, and is fatal to this appeal. I would dismiss the appeal.

[257] AIKMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. Amrit Gir, the father of the plaintiff, gave the defendant, Raghunath Singh, a mortgage over certain property. After the death of Amrit Gir, the mortgagee brought a suit against the plaintiff upon his mortgage-deed, obtained a decree, and in execution thereof brought the hypothecated property to sale. The execution was transferred to the Collector, by whom the property was sold. It was purchased by the mortgagee decree-holder. The plaintiff Jaikaran Gir, in the course of the execution proceedings, filed an objection based on an alleged adjustment of the decree which had taken place out of Court. His objection was disallowed, and, as stated above, the property was sold and purchased by the decree-holder. The plaintiff has now brought a regular suit to set aside the sale on the ground that the decree had been adjusted out of Court. His suit was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge, whose decree was confirmed on appeal by the District Judge. The Courts below held that the present suit was barred by the provisions of s. 244 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The plaintiff comes here in second appeal contending that that section does not bar his suit. By the provisions of that section, all questions arising between the parties to the suit in which a decree was passed, and relating to the execution, discharge or satisfaction of the decree or to the stay of execution thereof, must be determined by order of the Court executing the decree, and not by separate suit. Now, it cannot be denied that the question which arises in this suit is one between the parties to the former suit in which the decree was passed, and it is clear to me that it is a question relating to the execution of the decree. The cognizance of the suit, therefore, is barred by the provisions of s. 244 unless it can be shown that there is any other provision of law which excepts it from that section. The learned counsel who appears in support of the appeal, relies upon the last paragraph of s. 258 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In my opinion, that paragraph cannot be taken as overriding the clear provisions of s. 244. As to this I concur with the learned Judges who decided the case of Bairagulu v. Bapanna (1) [258] and with the majority of the Bench which decided the case of Azizan v. Matuk Lal Sahu (2). The plaintiff in this suit, if any adjustment of the decree took place out of Court, ought to have taken steps to have that adjustment certified to the Court. I do not think that his negligence in failing to take such steps can give the Court a jurisdiction which is clearly barred by the provisions of s. 244. It may be that he may have some other relief against his decree-holder, for instance, by a suit for damages, but I do not think that he can maintain a suit which would have the effect of nullifying a decree regularly obtained in a suit between him and the present defendant. For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

BY THE COURT.—The order of the Court is that the appeal is dismissed.

A plaintiff brought his suit in a Civil Court asking for a declaration of his right to the possession of certain lands as a tenant at fixed rates, or in the alternative for possession, alleging that the lands were the property of a joint Hindu family, of which he was a member, that the family still remained joint and that he was entitled as a member of such joint Hindu family to a one-third undivided share in this ancestral property.

Held, that the Civil Court was competent to give the plaintiff a decree declaring that he was a member of the joint Hindu family, that the family still remained joint, that the property in dispute was ancestral and had not been partitioned, and that the plaintiff was entitled to a one-third undivided share; further, that s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act would not apply to the suit, inasmuch as the Civil Court, if the plaintiff was found to be out of possession, was not competent to grant consequential relief in the shape of a decree for possession as a tenant at fixed rates.

[259] Held, also that in appeals under the Letters Patent, s. 10, an appellant is not entitled to be heard on points which he has not raised before the Judge against whose decree he is appealing.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—The zamindar of the village in which Brij Bhukhan Pande, the plaintiff in this suit, claims to be a tenant, sued Brij Bhukhan and other persons for arrears of rent. Brij Bhukhan's co-defendants denied that he was a tenant of the holding, which apparently was a fixed-rate holding. That we do not decide. The first Revenue Court decreed the claim for arrears of rent against the other defendants, but dismissed the claim against Brij Bhukhan on the ground that he had not been properly entered in the Revenue papers as a tenant, and that a decree for rent could not be made against him until he had obtained an amendment of the record of rights and had been properly entered in the record as a tenant. It is obvious that the Revenue Court did not actually or impliedly decide that Brij Bhukhan was not in fact, a tenant of the land in respect of which the rent was claimed. There was an appeal to the Collector, which was dismissed, but the Collector did not decide whether or not Brij Bhukhan was a tenant. He appears to have disposed of the case on the same lines as the first Court. Brij Bhukhan has brought this suit in a Civil Court, alleging that the lands in respect of which the suit for rent was brought in the Court of Revenue were ancestral lands belonging to a Hindu family of which he was a member, that the family was joint and that he was entitled as a member of that joint family to a one-third undivided share in this ancestral property. He asked for a declaration that he was a tenant at fixed rates of the lands and in joint possession of them with the other defendants to the suit in the Court of Revenue, who are defendants here, and for maintenance of such possession, and, the event of its being found that he was out of possession, [260] he asked for a decree for joint possession as a tenant at fixed rates. The first Court dismissed the suit. The Court of first appeal, partly on findings of fact and partly on admissions of the parties, found that the tenancy in question was part of the ancestral property of the joint Hindu family of which the plaintiff and the defendants are members, and that there had been no partition, and gave in general terms a decree decreeing the plaintiff's claim. It probably would puzzle the Court of first appeal to say now precisely what was the decree which it gave, the relief claimed being in the alternative and the decree merely decreeing the plaintiff's claim generally. That is not the way in which decrees should be made.

The defendants appealed to this Court from the decree in first appeal. The appeal came before a single Judge of this Court, and it was argued on behalf of the plaintiff, respondent to the appeal, on the basis that he was entitled to a decree declaring his right as a tenant and his right to be maintained as a tenant or to be put in possession as a tenant at fixed rates. On the case so presented, our brother Blair properly applied the decision in Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai (1) and allowed the appeal. No matter how the case had been presented to our brother Blair, it would have been necessary for him in any event to have allowed the appeal to some extent, for the decree of the Court of first appeal declaring Brij Bhukhan's title as a tenant at fixed rates of the holding and his right to possession as such tenant and giving him possession as such tenant was a decree which the Civil Court had no jurisdiction to pass. Our brother Blair allowed the appeal, and, setting aside the decree of the Court of first appeal, restored the decree of the first Court dismissing the suit. The plaintiff has brought this appeal under the Letters Patent from the decree of our brother Blair.

Probably, we should be right in dismissing this appeal, and certainly it will be necessary to dismiss it so far as it is based on the case which was argued before our brother Blair. It was many [261] years ago decided by the High Court at Calcutta, and rightly in our opinion, that in appeals under the Letters Patent, an appellant was not entitled to be heard on points which he had not raised before the Judge whose decree he was appealing, that is, that it was not intended that in an appeal under the Letters Patent an appellant should be entitled to make a new case. That is a rule which is approved by all the Judges in this Court, and which certainly has been, and, so long as the Court is constituted as at present, will be followed.

However, in this appeal Brij Bhukhan's case has been presented, not probably as an absolutely new case, certainly in a different light from that in which it must have been put by another vakil who appeared for him before our brother Blair. Mr. Haribans Sahai has contended, and we think rightly, that the Full Bench decision in Ajudhia Rai v. Parmeshar Rai (1) does not preclude a Civil Court in such a case as this from giving a member of a joint Hindu family a decree that the family has been and still is joint; that he is a member of it; that the lands or property in dispute are and were ancestral property in the hands of the family and have not been partitioned. He has also contended that it is immaterial whether his client is or is not in possession, as the proviso to s. 42 of the Specific Relief Act would not bar Brij Bhukhan's claim to such a declaration, the Civil Court being the only Court which could make the declaration, and the Civil Court having no jurisdiction to grant further consequential relief in the shape of a decree for possession as a tenant. We consider that that argument is well founded. We allow this appeal, and we set aside the decree of this Court, and vary the decree of the Court of first appeal by giving the plaintiff a declaration that the holding, whatever its nature may be, is part of the ancestral property of a joint Hindu family; that it has not been partitioned; that the plaintiff and the defendants are members of that joint Hindu family, and that the plaintiff's interest is a one-third undivided share of that ancestral property; in other [262] respects the suit of the plaintiff is dismissed. As this suit was necessitated by the action of these defendants in taking a very technical objection in the Court of Revenue, which in fact was an objection without substance or merits, we give the plaintiff Brij Bhukhan Pande his costs in all Courts in this civil suit.

The lien which a Muhammadian widow whose dower is unpaid may obtain on lands which have belonged to her deceased husband is a purely personal right and does not survive to her heirs Ali Muhammad Khan v. Azizullah Khan (1) and Ajuba Begam v. Nazir Ahmad (2) referred to.

THIS was an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from a judgment in second appeal of Banerji, J. The facts of the case appear from that judgment, which is as follows:—

"The appellant brought the suit out of which this appeal has arisen to recover possession of his share out of the estate of his deceased uncle. Karim Bakhsh, one of whose heirs he was. The suit was brought against Huran Bibi, the widow of Karim Bakhsh, and Hadi Ali, the donee of a portion of the property from Huran Bibi. Hadi Ali is the son of a daughter of Karim Bakhsh, who predeceased Karim Bakhsh. The Court of first instance decreed the claim. An appeal was preferred by Huran Bibi and Hadi Ali. Huran Bibi's appeal had reference to that portion of the estate which was not included in the gift to Hadi Ali. During the pendency of the appeal Huran Bibi died. Her legal representatives were her three daughters, who are admittedly alive, and not Hadi Ali, the son of a fourth predeceased daughter. The right as regards the property not comprised in the gift did not survive to Hadi Ali, therefore he alone could not maintain the appeal. As he was not one of the legal representatives of Huran [263] Bibi he could not be brought upon the record in the place of Huran Bibi, and as her legal representatives did not apply to be made parties to the appeal within the time allowed by law, the appeal of Huran Bibi abated, and, so far as the property in respect of which the appeal is concerned, the decree of the Court of first instance became final.

"As regards the property which is the subject of the alleged gift to Hadi Ali, the lower appellate Court has found that Huran Bibi was in possession of it in lieu of her dower. She was not entitled to transfer that property by way of gift or otherwise, and the gift was not legally valid. Having been put in possession in lieu of her dower, she was entitled to continue in possession so long as her dower debt remained unpaid: that was a right personal to her and became extinct on her death. Hadi Ali is not entitled to remain in possession of the estate left by Karim Bakhsh. The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to the decree granted to him by the Court of first instance.

"I allow this appeal with costs, and, setting aside the decree below with costs, restore that of the Court of first instance."

From this judgment the defendant Hadi Ali appealed.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J.—This is an appeal under the Letters Patent from the decree of our brother Banerji. He decided that a lien for her dower which a Muhammadan widow had obtained on lands of her husband was a purely personal right and did not survive to her heirs. This decision is supported by Ali Muhammad Khan v. Azizullah Khan (1) and Ajuba Begam v. Nazir Ahmad (2). It is contended that the latter case is not an authority, as it does not appear that the widow had obtained the lien by consent of her husband's heirs. In our opinion it is a very direct authority. Mr. Justice Mahmood held, rightly or wrongly, that the widow had obtained a lien—he may have been right or he may have been wrong on that point—[264] and, holding that she had a lien he held that it did not survive. We agree with our brother Banerji that such a lien does not survive, but is purely personal, and we dismiss the appeal with costs.

JUDGMENT.

KNOX, J.—Musammat Ahmadi Begam was suspected of having committed the offence of murder. The case was under inquiry with a view to commitment, if necessary, to the Court of Sessions. The evidence produced in support of the prosecution had apparently been put forward up to the 4th of December. On that date a petition was put in by Musammat Ahmadi Begam asking the Court to take the evidence of her witnesses under s. 208 of the Criminal Procedure Code before taking her statement. Upon that petition the first order passed is dated the 4th of December, and was as follows:—"It is too late to pass an order now, as it is about 5 p.m." With this order apparently the proceedings of the 4th of December came to a close. I understand that the accused had witnesses present in Court on that day who could have been then and there produced and examined. In that case I do not understand what difficulty the learned [265] Magistrate could have had in passing the only proper order under the circumstances, namely,—“those witnesses shall be heard either to-day or as soon as the Court re-opens to-morrow.” This would have been in accord with what appear to me to be the very clear words of the Code, and would have obviated all the difficulties which arose from the way in which the Magistrate subsequently dealt with the case.

On the 5th December, the accused put in another petition to the effect that, in the event of the Court deciding that her case must be committed to the Sessions, she wished to reserve her defence, and that she would in that Court make her replies to any questions that might be put to her for the purpose of enabling her to explain any circumstance appearing in the evidence against her. It was optional and entirely within the power of the accused to put in an application of this kind. The fact that she did do so would not absolve the Magistrate from his duty in carrying out the provisions of the law and from examining her, whether she answered or refused to answer. I mention this because of the order subsequently made by the learned Magistrate, from which it would appear that he thought that as soon as the accused reserved her defence he was not absolved from the duty of asking her for her statement, but he was absolved from the equally imperative duty of taking all such evidence as was produced on her behalf.

On the petition of the 5th of December the Magistrate writes that he must ask the accused herself what statement she has to make, in spite of what he terms an attempt on the part of the barrister for the accused to waive its right to examine the accused vested in it by s. 342 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. But he declined to hear the evidence tendered on her behalf, and then and there committed the accused for trial before the Court of Sessions. The Magistrate was not empowered to frame a charge or make out an order for commitment until and after he had taken all

When an application is made to restore an appeal which has been dismissed ex parte for default of appearance the applicant must produce all his evidence in support of the application before the Court to which it is made. If he does not do so and the application is dismissed, he cannot be allowed to supplement such evidence in a Court of appeal on appeal from the order dismissing his application. Hari Das Mukerji v. Radha Kishen Das (1) followed.

IN this case an appeal was dismissed by the Additional District Judge of Moradabad for default of appearance, the pleader for the appellant being absent when the appeal was called on for hearing. An application for the restoration of the appeal to the list of pending appeals was made, but no affidavit in support of such application was filed therewith. The Additional District Judge dismissed the application on two grounds, first, that it was not accompanied by an affidavit, and, secondly, that it disclosed no sufficient cause for the failure of the appellant or his pleader to appear. Against this order of dismissal the applicant appealed to the High Court, tendering an affidavit in support of his petition for restoration of the appeal.

BALWANT SINGH (Plaintiff Appellant) v. RANI KISHORI

[7th and 8th December, 1897, and 18th February, 1898.]

Hindu law—Mitakshara—Power of a member of a joint family to alienate self-acquired immoveables—Construction of words of a sanad granting an absolute estate of inheritance—Change of ancestral character of immoveables—Mortgage and foreclosure—Bona fide re-acquisition for value by the mortgagor's descendant.

A father, being a member of an undivided family subject to the Mitakshara, can exercise full power of disposition at his own discretion over immoveables which he has himself acquired, as distinguished from ancestral property.

The immoveables alienated by a father's gift, disputed by his son, partly consisted of zamindari rights in villages which had been, at one time, ancestral in the family, but had been transferred to satisfy the debts of an ancestor, and had been acquired back by his descendant, the donor. As to one of these villages the Courts below had differed whether it was self-acquired property in the donor's hands. It had been mortgaged by the ancestors; and the mortgage had been foreclosed, under Regulation XVII of 1806, before having been re-acquired by the donor.

That the foreclosure, and re-acquisition were genuine were facts found upon evidence, including that of prior, concurrent, decrees maintaining the foreclosure, as between other parties.

Held, that the re-acquisition was not a redemption of an estate inherited from an ancestor, and merely incumbered; but that the once ancestral character of this village had been destroyed by the foreclosure. Like the other villages alienated by the father's gift it was self-acquired by the donor.

[268] Other immovable property comprised in the gift consisted of a malikana payable out other villages conferred upon the donor by a Government sanad granting a muafi on seven villages to him for life, and declaring that "the zamindars who now pay the revenue will pay it to him, and after him they shall ever pay ten per cent. as malikana allowance to his heir after the deduction of Government revenue for generation after generation."

Held, that the grant of the malikana was absolute to the one grantee: that there were not two gifts, one for life to the grantee, and the other a distinct gift after his death, to the person who should then be his heir. The malikana formed part of the grantee's heritable property and was self-acquired.

Held, also, in reference to the High Courts' Act, 1861, in which no time is mentioned for the appointment of an acting judge on the occurrence of a vacancy, that such an appointment could not be questioned on the ground of its not having been made until after a period alleged to be unreasonable.

The suit out of which these appeals arose, was brought by the appellant who was the only son of the late Raja Jaswant Rao, C.S.I., who died on the 24th August 1879. The claim was for estate that had belonged to the late Raja, now in the possession of his widow, Rani Kishori, the defendant, who set up a title to it under a deed of gift, dated the 4th September 1875. By that deed the Raja conveyed to Rani Kishori what was virtually the whole of his property to the exclusion of the plaintiff, his son by another wife who was then deceased; and to this son the Raja left only an allowance of Rs. 100 a month, and this dependent upon his conducting himself to the widow's satisfaction. The suit alleged the invalidity of that gift.

All the facts material to this report appear in their Lordships' judgment.

The two Courts below concurred in findings of fact disentitling the plaintiff to the greater part of the estate claimed, which [269] consisted of zamindari, muafi, and malikana, interests in villages, and of moveable property.

The principal question among those now raised was whether, under the Mitakshara, if the property comprised in the deed of gift of 1895 had been acquired by the late Raja himself, he could deal with it at his own discretion; the plaintiff contending that the gift must be set aside, whether the property was ancestral or self-acquired. Another question related to whether the property, given by the deed fell within the description of self-acquired, or was ancestral. There was a third question: whether a malikana granted by sanad to the Raja and to his heir was, in regard to the words of inheritance, the Raja's own property to give away, or there was a gift over to the heir over which the Raja had no control. Also whether one of the judges who had heard the appeal had been duly appointed was now disputed.

The above principal question of Hindu law was applicable, after the concurrent findings of fact below in regard to the bulk of the estate claimed, only to five villages. And the subordinate question, whether they all were rightly under the description "self acquired," applied, as far as this appeal was concerned, only to one village; inasmuch as the two Courts below had concurred upon facts, proving that four of the villages were in that class of property, and in finding that the four were so.

It was ground common to both parties that the zamindari interest in the five villages had, at one time, formed part of the ancestral property of the family, having been inherited by the late Raja Jaswant's father, Rao Khaman Singh; and it was found by both Courts that, to satisfy the debts of Kaman Singh, the ancestral property had been sold or transferred. Both Courts had also found that four of the five villages had been re-acquired by the Raja Jaswant without recourse to any ancestral funds. The District Judge, however, had been of opinion that the fifth, named Bakewar, had not been so dealt with as to have got rid of its ancestral character in the hands of the late Raja when he made the gift of the 4th of September 1875. But the High Court [270] on the contrary, had found that the re-acquisition by the late Raja out of his own resources applied to Bakewar as well as to the other four villages, and that this village was his self-acquired property as well as the others.

The question as to whether the malikana passed by the Raja's gift to his wife, as being the donor's property, arose on the construction of a jaghir sanad, dated the 6th of April 1861, from the Government to the Raja. That sanad entitled him to a muafi, or remission of the revenue upon seven villages, including the five above referred to, and declared that, "after him the zamindars shall ever pay ten per cent. as malikana allowance to his heir, after the deduction of Government revenue, for generation after generation."

First.—In regard to the question whether a member of an undivided family has or has not the power to alienate at his discretion self-acquired property the judgment of the District Judge was as follows:—"The authorities on the point are reviewed in para. 318 of Mayne's well-known work on Hindu Law and Usage, 4th edition, from which it will be seen that the tendency of the later decisions is to hold that a father may dispose of his self-acquired property in any way he pleases. Following the latest rulings, I hold that, if the property referred to in the deed of gift was Raja Jaswant Rao's self-acquired property, he could deal with it as he saw fit; and his disposition of it cannot be successfully attacked by the plaintiff. It will follow that so far as it can be shown that the property comprised in the deed of gift is ancestral, to that extent the deed must be held to be invalid, and the plaintiff entitled to succeed, whilst on the other hand, the deed will hold good in respect of all property shown to be self-acquired."

Secondly.—The plaintiff comes into Court alleging that the transfers of the five villages, in which his father possessed zamindari rights, were fictitious, and that his father all along remained in possession of them. It was necessary for him to prove [271] this allegation and I hold that as to the four villages Lakhman, Berikhera, Aberipur and Indraokhi, he has failed to do so. His claim, therefore, as regards these villages must be dismissed. As to the fifth village, Bakewar, the case stands on a different footing from that of the other villages. From documentary evidence filed in the case it appears that it was mortgaged by Rao Khuman Singh to one Kunjbehari Lal by a deed of conditional sale executed on 19th August 1839. It had been previously mortgaged to one Mahant Lachman Das in 1836. On the death of Khuman Singh, which took place in 1845, litigation took place between the rival mortgagees. The dispute between them was referred to arbitration and decided on the 11th May 1846, the result being that Kunjbehari Lal paid off the amount due to the prior mortgagee. He got a decree on the 20th of March 1854, to have his name entered as proprietor, and Jaswant Rao's name expunged. But in a suit between him and Jaswant Rao, decided on the 19th of August 1869, it was held that this decree was never executed and had become barred by lapse of time, and that Kunjbehari Lal had been in possession only as mortgagee.

Evidence has been given on behalf of defendant to prove that on the 22nd of June 1858, in lieu of a payment of Rs. 4,526-12-0 received from Thakurain Adhar Kunwar, through Jaswant Rao, her general manager, and Sheo Charan Lal, her agent, Kunjbehari Lal gave up the decrees he had, and declared his foreclosure proceedings cancelled (see No. 104 of defendant's documents). The defendant's counsel contends that this was a sale of the proprietary rights of the village; but this is a contention I cannot sustain. In the suit above referred to, decided on the 19th of August, 1869, it was held that Kunjbehari Lal was in possession of the village only as mortgagee and the amount paid, which is less than the annual revenue of the village, bears out the plaintiff's

" contention that what took place on the 22nd of June 1858 was nothing " but the discharge of an incumbrance on the village. On an application " to a Revenue Court of March 18th, [272] 1868, Jaswant Rao represented
" it as having been in his proprietary possession up to that year, " and as always having been entered in his name. Although in " the deed of gift he asserted that this village had been bestowed " on him by Adhar Kunwar, this is without foundation, as I consider.
" This village is not included in the deed of 1871 by which " she conveyed to Jaswant Rao the villages of Lakhman, Berikhera, " Aheripur, and Indraokhi, and no reason is suggested for this exclusion.
" The evidence adduced to prove the gift is extremely feeble....To hold " that a transaction of this nature has the effect of destroying the ancestral
" character of property would be a most dangerous doctrine, as it would put " it in the power of any Hindu father to defeat his children's rights by a " temporary alienation of the property he himself had inherited. The con" clusion I come to, then, as regards this village, is that Jaswant Rao " inherited the proprietary rights in it from his father; that he had, there" fore, no power to convey these rights to his wife, and that in respect of " this village the plaintiff is entitled to a decree."

Proceeding to another class of property included in the gift, viz., the assigned revenue of seven villages, the District Judge said:—"The effect of the grant as regards the seven villages, of which the Raja did not own the proprietary right, was that the zamindars of those villages had to pay their land revenue to him as long as he lived, instead of to the Government, and after his death had to pay a percentage of it to his successor. I am of opinion that an estate of this nature is self-acquired property, and in this opinion I am borne out by the views expressed in para. 262 of Mayne's Hindu Law and usage, where it is laid down that estates conferred by Government in the exercise of their sovereign power become the self-acquired property of the donee, whether such gifts are absolutely new grants or only the restoration to one member of the family of property previously held by another but confiscated."... "As to the ten per cent. malikana allowance from the other villages it was for the plaintiff to show that his father had no power of disposing of it, and that [273] he, the son, was entitled to succeed to it under the terms of the sanad. This contention, in my opinion, is likewise unsound." The decision, accordingly, was that the plaintiff's claim to this part of the assigned revenue failed.

On appeal and cross appeal to the High Court the three principal points were dealt with as follows in the judgment of a Divisional Bench (KNOX and BURKITT, JJ.). First, as to the general question of the right to dispose of self-acquired immoveables the Court said:—

" There is a last plea in the memorandum of appeal to the effect that Raja Jaswant Rao was not competent to disinherit his only son, the appellant. To this plea the learned counsel for the appellant made no allusion beyond stating that he did not withdraw it. The respondent's counsel did not answer the plea. An attempt was made on behalf of the appellant at the very end of the reply to address us upon it. We, however, ruled that, under the circumstances, it was not competent to the learned counsel to address any argument to us then for the first time. The plea will be dealt with towards the end of our judgment in this appeal."

At the end, however, it was added:—"In the view of the above facts no necessity arises for considering the plea."

Secondly, the Judges considered the question as to the village Bakewar, holding that the lower Court had arrived at a wrong conclusion in regard to it, by reason of overlooking the fact that this village had lost its ancestral character as soon as the year of grace allowed by Reg. XVII of 1806 expired in 1854. They continued thus :—"From that date Kunjbehari Lal became absolute proprietor. Even granting that the effect of the decree of the 19th of August 1869, in the suit to which we shall next refer between Kunjbehari Lal and Jaswant Rao, in which it was held that Kunjbehari Lal had been in possession only as mortgagee, gave Jaswant Rao the status of proprietor with a right to redeem, he would be proprietor of self-acquired, not of ancestral property."

[274] "When Kunjbehari Lal transferred his rights in Bakewar to Thakurain Adhar Kunwar he realized that he was proprietor. Otherwise, there would have been no force or meaning in his pretence to set aside and annul the foreclosure transaction—an act which he had absolutely no power to do. As full proprietor, he transferred to Thakurain Adhar Kunwar thereby making her full proprietor. It seems to us that this document did not receive the force and construction which it should have received at the hands of the lower Court. It supplements and corroborates the evidence given by Gursahai."

"In 1869 the village became again the subject of litigation. This time between Kunjbehari Lal and Raja Jaswant Rao, and in that suit the extraordinary decision was arrived at that, as Kunjbehari Lal had never executed his decree of the 20th March 1854, and it had become barred by lapse of time, Kunjbehari Lal had been in possession only as mortgagee. The Court of first instance apparently accepts the conclusion, and holds that Bakewar never passed out of the hands of Khuman Singh or his family, and that Kunjbehari Lal never had any higher title in regard to it than that of mortgagee. This conclusion is attacked by the appellant. He contends before us that Kunjbehari Lal, by his decree of the 20th of March 1854, became full proprietor over the village, and that on that day at any rate Bakewar ceased to be ancestral property."

"It appears to us that there is great force in this contention. Under Reg. XVII of 1806 the conditional sale-deed had been judicially declared absolute, and nothing more was needed to clothe Kunjbehari Lal with the status of full proprietor. He had been in possession as mortgagee, but from the date of the decree of the 20th of March 1854, his possession as proprietor became at once adverse to that of Jaswant Rao, and the property ceased to be that of Jaswant Rao's in any sense ancestral or otherwise. It matters little that by the endorsement on the decree above alluded to, viz., the endorsement of the 22nd of June 1858, Kunjbehari Lal professed to set aside the foreclosure proceedings and [275] to render them null and void; no words and no document of his could effect such an act or could restore to Bakewar its former condition, viz., that of ancestral property in the hands of Jaswant Rao."

"The language of s. 8 of Regulation XVII of 1806 is very clear and precise, and provides that if the mortgagor, in this case Raja Jaswant Rao, shall not redeem the property, the property mortgaged in the manner provided for by s. 7 of the same regulation, the mortgage will be finally foreclosed and the conditional sale will become conclusive. Thakurain Adhar Kunwar held the village for some months, and then made it over to Jaswant Rao. In 1868, Jaswant Rao sold the village “ to Sheo Narayan, and immediately upon the sale arose the litigation of “ 1869, between Kunjbehari Lal and Raja Jaswant Rao which ended in “ the decision above referred to.

“ The respondent takes his stand upon the judgment and decree of “ 1869, that was delivered in the suit above-mentioned, brought by Kunj-“ behari Lal for establishment of right to, and maintenance of possession
“ over, Bakewar, and to set aside a sale-deed under which Raja Jaswant “ Rao had, on the 15th of February 1868, conveyed it to Sheo Narayan.
“ It is a most involved and in many places obscure judgment, but there “ was no doubt that under it Kunjbehari Lal's claim was dismissed, and “ it was held that the foreclosure proceedings were fictitious, the only object “ being to save the property.

“ In considering the value of this judgment it must not be forgotten “ that, so far as the appellant was concerned, it was not a judgment inter “ partes, and that at its highest it cannot be looked upon as conclusive, “ but only as a piece of evidence. Both the appellant and respondent in “ this appeal are representatives of Raja Jaswant Rao who was defendant
“ in that case. No one in this appeal derives title through Kunjbehari Lal, “ who was then plaintiff. Moreover, it was in no way competent to the “ Court which decided the case in 1869 to set aside the foreclosure judg“ ment and decree of 1854.

[276] “ The Sadr Dewani Adalat in 1856 had determined that the “ mortgage-deeds of Lachman Das and Kunjbehari Lal were both genuine “ instruments; that the deed of conditional-sale held by Kunjbehari Lal “ was considered as being still in force and in nowise modified by the “ arbitration-award, positions both of which are assailed by this judg“ ment without any reference to the determination of the case, by the “ Sadr Dewani Adalat. The judgment in question virtually amounts to “ a setting aside of those findings.

“ Much stress was laid upon the improbability of a valuable village “ like Bakewar being conveyed for a sum of Rs. 4,526-12-0. This con“ sideration is not, however, entitled to much weight; the transaction took “ place just after the mutiny and at the time when Kunjbehari Lal was,
“ if any value is to be attached to the judgment of 1869, under great obli“ gations to Raja Jaswant Rao for procuring him release from custody.
“ Matters at this time had, so far as Kunjbehari Lal was concerned, reached
“ a very serious crisis, and if the bargain relating to Bakewar saved “ Kunjbehari Lal from death by hanging, it was, so far as he was con“ cerned, a valuable bargain. Kunjbehari Lal, so says the judgment “ aforesaid, and there is other evidence to corroborate it, had been arrested
“ and was about to be tried by martial law, and according to the Special “ Commissioner deserved to be hanged. The value of property too at a “ time like this would be very different from its value in days of security.

“ Putting all this evidence together, and bearing in mind that it was
“ for respondent to establish that the transfer of Bakewar was fictitious,
“ we do not think that he has established his case. We find that on the “ 20th of March 1854, Bakewar had ceased to be ancestral property. It “ matters little how Raja Jaswant Rao afterwards became possessed of “ it. It could only be self-acquired property in his hands, and capable of “ alienation by him at his pleasure.....
“ The village Bakewar, when we first came upon it, is mortgaged to “ strangers. The equity of redemption, it is true, remained [277] with “ Raja Jaswant Rao, but passed away from him finally, and without "power of recall, as soon as the year of grace given under Reg. XVII of 1806 expired. This was before the year 1854. Hence it was clearly upon Balwant Singh to establish that the property retained its ancestral character, and that the transfer to Kunjbehari Lal, by force of the foreclosure proceedings, and the transfers after 1854, were one and all fictitious."

Thirdly, the judgment disposed of the question as to the malikana in this Raja's gift in the following words:—

"Now as regards the interpretation to be put on the grant made by Government and bearing date the 6th day of April 1861. The first fact to be noticed in connection with it is that it makes no allusion whatever to the appellant or to any service rendered by him. The grant confers certain of the villages on Raja Jaswant, Rai Bahadur, 'for generation after generation.' As to the rest the words are that they are granted for his lifetime and that the revenue of the seven villages granted for lifetime shall remain under remission during his life, and that after his death the zamindars are to pay 10 per cent. malikana to Jaswant Rao's heirs after the deduction of Government revenue for generation after generation. The whole language of the deed shows that it was a deed granted in return for personal good services rendered to the Government. There is nothing in the deed to lead us to hold that the property conveyed by it was not property over which Raja Jaswant Rao had full right of disposal.

"The interpretation which we have put upon the deed and which was put upon it by the lower Court, is in accord with the view taken by their Lordships of the Privy Council in Gulab Das, Jagjiwan Das v. The Collector of Surat (1). Their Lordships held that 'a jaghir must be taken prima facie to be an estate only for life, although it may possibly be granted in such terms as to make it hereditary.'"

[278] "Jaswant Rao had in our opinion as much right and control over all the property granted under it as if it was self-acquired property."

The decrees of the High Court dismissed the suit entirely, and these two appeals were preferred by the plaintiff.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross, for the appellant, argued that although the District Judge was right in attributing to the later decisions of the Courts in India a uniform ruling to the effect that, under the Mitakshara, a member of an undivided family has absolute power of disposition over property acquired by himself, yet the question whether the exercise of that power was in accordance with the Hindu law, had never been actually decided by the Judicial Committee. It was therefore still open to argument. The point was whether, in an undivided family under the Mitakshara, the father could so deal with immoveables acquired by himself as to disinherit his only son. Reference was made to Babu Pertab Sahee v. Maharaja Rajender Pertab Sahee (2), the Hansapur case, as showing that the question of the power of the head of the family in this respect had been designedly left open by this Committee. There were conflicting texts in the Mitakshara as to the power of a member of an undivided family on this point. He referred to the Mitakshara, Ch. I., s. 1, v. 27, and to Ch. I, s. 5, v. 10, arguing that, contrary to the decisions of the Indian Courts, the conflict of these authorities should be decided in favour of the view that the power could not be held established. Reference was also made to Strange's Hindu Law, vol. 1, p. 261, and to vol. 2, pp. 436, 439, 441, 450 and to the Vivada Chintamani, which he described as a compendium of law prevalent in Mithila, not materially differing from the Mitakshara, and also having conflicting paragraphs, see pp. 76, 309, 228, 229. Reference was also made to the Vayavahara Mayukha. There was one case decided by the Judicial Committee, according to the Mithila law as stated in a dictum in the Vivada Chintamani, to the effect that the owner of self-acquired property has [279] full power of disposition over it. Raja Bishen Ferkash Narain Singh v. Bawa Misser (1). He referred also to the Bithoor case, Nana Nurain Rao v. Huree Punth Bhao (2). For decisions in the North-West Provinces on this point he referred to Rajah Buldeo Singh v. Koonwer Mahabeer Singh in 1866 before Spankie and Turner, J.J. (3), Maha Sukh v. Budree (4), and Sital v. Madho (5). As a Madras Decision in his favour he referred to Tara Chand v. Reeb Ram (6).

Upon the second point, whether the District Judge was right in deciding that Bakewar retained its original character of ancestral estate, he examined the evidence at length arguing that the acts of the mortgagee Kunjbehari Lal, with reference to the foreclosure, showed collusion with the late Raja. The arrangement was in effect fraudulent on the creditors of Khuman Singh who were now all barred by time, and was contrary to the rights of the appellant as heir of the mortgaged property.

The foreclosure could even at this distance of time be re-opened. He referred to the Regulation XVII of 1806, ss. 1, 7 and 8, and to Forbes v. Amceeroonissa Begum (7). In an early case—Morley v. Elwayes (8)—it was shown that to re-open a foreclosure the facts could be examined, and the Court, on fraud established, could restore the parties to their original position.

Upon the third point, the construction of the sanad of 1861, the contention was in reference to the malikana, that the grant was only for life to Jaswant, and after him to his heir, as an absolute gift to the latter, that heir being the son, the appellant, to whom there was a distinct gift apart from the assignment for life to his father. Thus the malikana in perpetuity was not within the control of Jaswant to confer upon his wife.

Lastly, it was submitted that the appointment of Burkitt, J., to act as a Judge of the High Court had not been made in due [280] time under the High Court's Act, 1861, with the result that there had been no Court properly constituted to hear these appeals. The argument was to the same effect as that in the Queen-Empress v. Gunga Ram (9). The decision in that case had been in favour of the validity of the appointment, but the judgment of the Full Bench was of a date subsequent to that of the judgment now under appeal, 24 and 25 Vic., C. 104, referred to.

Mr. J. D. Mayne and Mr. H. Cowell, for the respondent. Some of the texts, in condemning the leaving a family without means of support, seemed to make objection to the alienation of even self-acquired property. But for the last twenty-five years the decisions in India had been unanimous as to the power of the owner under the Mitakshara to dispose absolutely of self-acquired property. The judgment of the Bengal High Court in Mudhu Gopal v. Ram Buksh Pandey (10) had disposed of all controversy in regard to the conflict of dicta found in the Mitakshara.

Reference was made to the Hansapore case (1), and to the Bithoor case (2), where the question was raised as to this power. In the latter case, the judgment, in deciding upon a question of fact, proceeded upon the view that the law had been settled in favour of the acquirer of property having power to dispose of it. Raja Bishen Parkash Narain Singh v. Bawa Misser (3), was cited.

On the question as to Bakewar, the decision of the High Court was right. The operation of Regulation XVII of 1806 was referred to, and its effect, after the expiration of the year of grace. Neither the plaint, nor any of the proceedings, raised the question whether, assuming the mortgage to have been valid, the foreclosure was collusive. The plaint raised only the question whether Khuman Singh's mortgages were valid. The litigation after the foreclosure did not tend to show collusion. The judgment of the District Judge of Mainpuri, reported in the North-Western [281] Provinces District Reports for September 1854 (Mainpuri), and in the Reports of the Sudder Court, Agra, S.D.A. 1856 at p. 119, did not indicate any such fact. The later litigation, to which Kunjbehari Lal was a party, did not attack the foreclosure, but raised the issue whether the indorsement of transfer was genuine. The ancestral quality of the property has been lost when it was re-acquired. In regard to the third point, the construction of the sanad of April, 1861, it was clear that nine-tenths of the remitted revenue was to revert to Government, and the one-tenth, malikana, was to continue, upon the death of the Raja. But his heir was not to take any interest distinct from the estate of inheritance given to the Raja himself absolutely.

Upon the validity of the appointment of Burkitt, J., the point had not been taken in the Court below, and there were no facts on this record to give rise to any question about it.

Mr. G. E. A. Ross replied.

Afterwards on the 18th February, 1898, their Lordships' judgment was delivered by Lord Hobhouse:—

JUDGMENT.

In the suit which gives rise to this appeal, the plaintiff now appellant claimed as heir-at-law of Raja Jaswant Rao to be entitled to properties valued at 40 lakhs of rupees, of which Jaswant's widow Kishori, the defendant below and the respondent here, had become possessed. As regards the larger portion of this property, principally moveable, the plaintiff has failed in both the Courts below, and raises no further question. He still claims (1) the proprietary right in five villages conveyed as a gift by Jaswant to Kishori by deed dated 4th September, 1875; (2) the proprietary right in two other villages purchased by the defendant after Jaswant's death; and (3) a perpetual charge by way of malikana amounting to 10 per cent. of the revenue of seven other villages which were the subject of a grant by the Government of India to Jaswant, dated 6th April, 1861. The District Judge decided against the plaintiff as to all these properties except one of the five villages named Bakewar. As to that village the District Judge held that it was ancestral property which Jaswant had [282] no power to alienate by way of gift, and he decreed possession of it to the plaintiff. Both parties appealed to the High Court. Separate orders were made on the two appeals. The plaintiff's appeal was dismissed; the defendant's was allowed; so that the plaintiff's suit stood dismissed as to all his claims. The plaintiff has appealed from both these orders and his appeals, in form two, but in substance one, have now been argued.

Except as regards the village of Bakewar, which has been the subject of difference between the two Courts below, the facts of the case may be briefly stated:—All the villages in suit were at one time the estate of Khuman Singh, the father of Jaswant. Through extravagance or misfortune Khuman fell into poverty and he parted with the villages: whether in fact or only in appearance is matter of dispute in this suit. Jaswant became a successful man of business, and he also rendered active and valuable services to the Government at the time of the Sepoy mutiny. Thus, he became able to repossess himself of the estates which Khuman had enjoyed, and the Government acknowledged his services by the grant in question. Khuman died in December, 1844. His eldest son, Lal Barian, married Adhar Kunwar, a lady of considerable private fortune, and died without issue. Jaswant was the only other son, and he married Kishori, as his third wife. He died in August, 1879.

The plaintiff's claim under the grant stands on an entirely different footing from his other claims, and it may be disposed of at once. The Sanad of April 1861 recites the services of Jaswant and that they had been recognised by the bestowal of the title of "Raja" and were worthy of further recognition by the grant of a "jaghir." It then continues:—"Be it known that the possession and jama (revenue) of the "five villages granted for generation after generation, shall for ever be "given up and remitted, and that the revenue of the seven villages "granted for lifetime shall remain under remission till his lifetime, to wit, "their zamindars who now pay the revenue to the British Government "shall pay it to him, and after him they shall ever pay 10 per cent. as " [283] malikana allowance to his heir after the deduction of Govern- "ment revenue, for generation after generation." The five villages are the five villages before mentioned as contained in the deed of gift.

Mr. Ross does not contend that the words "generation after generation" confer any interest less than absolute ownership, nor does he now sustain the contention urged in the lower Courts that the jama of the five villages did not pass to Jaswant in absolute ownership. His contention is, that as regards the seven villages, there are two distinct gifts: one to Jaswant for his life, and the other after his death; and that at his death the malikana is given in absolute ownership to the person who may then happen to be his heir. That would attribute to the Government the strange intention of acknowledging the personal merits of Jaswant by conferring a benefit on some unknown heir for whom he might or might not have a regard. The construction also appears to their Lordships to be as strained as it is improbable. They think that the obvious meaning of the expression "his heir for generation after generation" is that the malikana is to form part of his heritable property; and that whereas he takes the whole income for his life only, he is to take the 10 per cent. malikana in absolute ownership. Both the Courts below have taken substantially the same view, and the appeal fails on this point.

The next question is whether Jaswant could lawfully give the property in question to his wife. The District Judge states that the point is one on which there has been a great conflict of opinion; and without discussing it further he says that he follows the latest rulings in holding that if the property comprised in the gift was Jaswant's self-acquired property, he could deal with it as he saw fit. The High Court have given no opinion on the point except so far as an opinion is involved in their affirmation of the District Judge's decree, nor did they hear argument upon it. It was one point of appeal by the plaintiff but his counsel did not open it till at the very end of his reply, when the Court ruled that it was not competent for him to argue it. In delivering judgment, they [284] stated their opinion that the plaintiff, by not addressing to them any remarks in support of this argument, must be taken virtually to have abandoned it.

Mr. Ross has raised the question again in this appeal, and has addressed to their Lordships a serious argument which requires consideration. His proposition is that a member of an undivided family subject to Mitakshara law has not the power of disposition over self-acquired immoveable property at his will. The Indian Courts have differed on this question, and there is no decision of this Board which after examination of the authorities affirms the power in unqualified terms.

It is not surprising that conflicts of opinion should have arisen, seeing that the texts of the Mitakshara itself, as translated by Colebrooke, whose translation has long been accepted as correct, are apparently and literally in conflict with one another. The passage cited by Mr. Ross is found in Chapter I, s. 1, clause 27, and is as follows:—Speaking of the father of a family, it says that "he is subject to the control of his sons" and the rest in regard to the immoveable estate whether acquired by himself or inherited from his father or other predecessor. Since it is "ordained, 'though immoveables or bipeds have been acquired by a man himself, a gift or sale of them should not be made without convening all the sons. They who are born, and they who are yet unbegotten, and they who are still in the womb, require the means of support. No gift or sale should therefore be made.'" And immediately below the commentator insists on a man's duty not to leave his family without means of support. Mr. Ross further points out that the rule so stated as to immoveable property is accepted as law by Sir Thomas Strange: see Vol. I, p. 261, Vol. II, pp. 436 and following.

On the other hand, we find in the same source of law quite opposite precepts. In clause 21 of the same chapter and section the commentator quotes two texts, one from Yajnavalkya himself, to the same effect with clause 27 and then adds "they both [285] relate to immoveables which have descended from the paternal grandfather." In s. V of the same chapter, clause 9, the commentator, speaking of a donation made by a father, says:—"the son has no right of interference if the effects were acquired by the father;" and in clause 10 the same precept is repeated with more particularity. So in s. IV, where the commentator appears to be dealing with the principle which lies at the root of the system of joint family property. He there explains what may not be divided; and in Clause 1 he says:—"Whatever else is acquired by the co-parcener himself.....does not appertain to the heirs.....nor shall he who recovers hereditary property which had been taken away give it up to the parceners." Clause 2 enlarges on the same point.

Pausing there to consider the authorities apart from decisions, their Lordships observe that the rule laid down in s. 1, clause 27 of the Mitakshara rests upon an ulterior reason, "since it is ordained," and so forth; and the reason ranges so far beyond the rule as seriously to weaken its support of a positive rule. The necessity of support to children applies in principle to the alienation of moveable property as well as immoveable. And the assertion of rights in those who are unbegotten conflicts with the principle uncontradicted as their Lordships understand by any decision, that a man may alienate even his descended estate if he has no child, or at least if he has no co-parcener, in existence. See the cases cited for this proposition in Mr. Mayne's book on Hindu Law, s. 318.

All these old text-books and commentaries are apt to mingle religious and moral considerations, not being positive laws, with rules intended for positive laws. In the preface to his valuable work on Hindu law Sir W. Macnaghten says:—"It by no means follows that because an act has been prohibited it should therefore be considered as illegal. The distinction between the vinculum juris and the vinculum pudoris is not always discernible." (Hindu Law, Principles and Precedents, p. vi of the preliminary remarks) He illustrates this position by the [286] example of the very subject of the present discussion. It is, as their Lordships think, the most reasonable inference that the passage in s. I belongs to the former class of precepts and those of ss. IV and V to the latter.

As regards the authority of Sir T. Strange, which undoubtedly is great, their Lordships observe that, though he does not bring the conflicting texts of the Mitakshara into comparison with one another, he introduces similar contradictions into the body of his own work. In his "Addenda" he corrected his own opinions by the authority of Sir Francis Macnaghten's Considerations on Hindu Law, which work he had seen after he had written his own. He says that he has used Macnaghten's work for supplementing, for correcting, or for confirming his own (Addenda, p. 4). Among the passages which he adopts is the following:—"It is desirable that the extent to which a Hindu in his lifetime may give or make an unequal distribution of his property should be ascertained. I think it clear that he has a right to dispose of his self-acquired property whether moveable or immoveable, according to his own pleasure, and that he has the same right as to ancestral moveable property." Addenda, p. 8. It seems then that Strange intended to accept for Madras the opinion of Macnaghten who, though a Bengal Judge, wrote of the Benares as well as the Bengal school. Macnaghten's opinion, clearly applying to the Mitakshara law, is that the father of a family, with regard to all kinds of property acquired by himself, is at liberty to make any alienation he may think fit, subject only to spiritual responsibility.

To turn to the decided cases, there is no decision of this Board which is adverse to the power of alienation claimed by the defendant. Mr. Ross referred to the language of the Board in the Hansapore case (1) decided in 1867. Sir James Colvile, after showing that by that time testamentary powers, long disputed, had been established in Hindu law, spoke thus:—"Accordingly it has been settled that even in those parts of [287] India which are governed by the stricter law of the Mitakshara a Hindu without male descendants may dispose by will of his separate and self-acquired property whether moveable or immoveable; and that one having male descendants may so dispose of self-acquired property if immoveable; subject perhaps to the restriction that he cannot wholly disinherit any one of such descendants." It is argued that this passage shows that in the opinion of the Board the power of disposition by will does not extend to land and does not exist if there are male descendants. In that case, however, the Board gave no judicial opinion upon the point, because they held that the property in dispute was an indivisible Raj, subject to the custom of primogeniture, and that, as the heir was a consenting party to the disposition in dispute, the question of the testator's power did not arise. It is true that they did not affirm the proposition now contended for by the defendant.

In the Bithoor case (1), there came into question the validity of a will devising self-acquired property. There was a long and intricate discussion as to the genuineness of the will, which was ultimately established. It appears also that objection was taken to the legal power of the testator, but it does not appear on what grounds that point was argued. The only passage in the judgment bearing on this question is as follows:—"The rest of the evidence consists of the testimony of Pundits, who say that the Soobadar was always obedient to the Shasters, and that the Shasters forbid a father who has several sons to appropriate by will to one the property which by law ought to be equally divided amongst all. It is clear that in this district a strong feeling prevails among the Brahmins upon the subject of testamentary disposition, which though at length established by law as to self-acquired property is opposed to the ancient usages and feelings of the country." That was a decision in favour of the power to make such a will; but the grounds of it do not appear; the attention of the Board would seem to have been directed to the [288] general question of testamentary power, rather than to distinctions between ancestral and self-acquired estate; and in the Hansapore case the present proposition was treated by this Board as still open to argument and to qualifications.

Their Lordships do not think it necessary to go through the series of Indian decisions bearing on this point, but they will refer to some of the most important and of the latest date. It appears to them that the subject is one of those in which from the earliest times there have been two conflicting principles of law, one favouring the perpetual integrity and the fixed succession of family property, and the other the free use of such property for the circumstances of the day. The controversies and conflicting decisions on the father's powers of mortgage and sale, on the payment of his debts out of the inheritance, and on the testamentary power, will occur to everybody who is familiar with Indian litigations of the past half century or so. On each of those subjects there has been a growing tendency, coincident with the growth of commerce, to give more effect to the latter of the two principles, viz., the use of property by the living generation, or its living heads. This their Lordships conceive is the kind of change referred to by Lord Kinsdown in the Bithoor case.

The earliest case in which their Lordships have found any exact comparison of the texts of the Mitakshara was decided by a division Bench of the High Court of Calcutta in the year 1863. Mudhu Gopal v. Ram Buksh (2). In that case the plaintiff's father had sold to the defendant property which was held to be self-acquired. The learned Judges carefully compared the texts of the Mitakshara. They treat those of ss. IV and V as the governing ones. They conclude:—"We must hold that according to the law as laid down in the Mitakshara, a father is not incompetent to sell immoveable property acquired by himself."

In the year 1872 the question was discussed before a Full Bench in Calcutta (3). A son disputed his father's disposition of property inherited by the father from a cousin and not from [289] the grandfather. Sir Richard Couch compares the texts and quotes cases which as he says exhibit the better opinion among commentators. His conclusion is this:—"It is only in respect of property not liable to obstruction that the wealth of the father or grandfather becomes the property of his sons or grandsons by virtue of birth." In this case the property being inherited by the father from a cousin was held to be obstructed as to inheritance.

As regards the North-Western Provinces the question was carefully considered in the year 1877 by two experienced civilian Judges [Sital v. Madho (1)]. Those learned Judges did not consider themselves bound by a previous decision of the High Court in 1869, which negatived the father's power to alienate, but without citing the authorities. In their elaborate judgment they make more than one suggestion for reconciling the conflicting texts. They say that the Courts have recognised the principle that the prohibition of certain acts may be implied, yet where it is not declared that there is absolutely no power to do them those acts if done are not necessarily void. And in the end they adopt Sir Wm. Macnaghten's view "that with respect to personal property whether ancestral or acquired, and with respect to real property acquired or recovered by the occupant, he (the father) is at liberty to make any alienation which he may think fit, subject only to spiritual responsibility." (See Principles, &c., p. 3.) This is the same view as is expressed by Sir Francis Macnaghten, and adopted by Sir T. Strange in the passage above quoted.

Their Lordships fully assent to the reasoning contained in the judgments they have cited; and they find that in India there is a decided preponderance of judicial authority in favour of the power claimed for Jaswant in this case.

It remains to mention a decision of this Board in the year 1873, which, though it falls under the Mithila law, appears to their Lordships to bear closely on the present case. It is reported [290] in 12 Beng. L. R., p. 430, Raja Bishen v. Bawa Misser. The Mithila law differs in some respects from that of the Mitakshara, but on the subject in question follows it very closely. The leading text-book is the Vivada Chintamani, and their Lordships quote from the translation made in 1863. In page 76 and again in page 229 are passages giving a free hand to the owners of self-acquired property. In p. 229 it is written:—"Such property as is acquired or recovered by the father without the aid of the ancestral estate shall be divided equally, or unequally, or not divided at all, at his pleasure. The father has full dominion over that property which is gained by him through skill, valour or the like, he may give it away at his pleasure," and so forth. In p. 309 occurs this passage:—"It is declared in the work called Prakasa that immoveable and biped property, even if it be self-acquired, cannot be sold or given away without the consent of the sons. They who are born even they who are not yet conceived, require paternal property for their maintenance therefore it is improper to deprive them of it." The decision of this Board was in accordance with the first set of texts. It is true that p. 309 is not referred to in the judgment, but it can hardly be supposed that in a case fought up to the highest tribunal it was overlooked.

For the foregoing reasons their Lordships have no hesitation in laying it down that the law of the Mitakshara is shown after long conflicts of opinion due to the conflicting nature of the original texts, to be that which has been adopted from Sir William Macnaghten by the Courts of Calcutta and Allahabad.

Such being the law it remains to apply it to this case. The plaintiff contends that the property in question was ancestral. As regards the four villages the dispute turns on matters of fact and the Courts below are agreed in finding against the plaintiff. That dispute cannot be reopened here. As regards Bakewar they have differed, and the plaintiff asks their Lordships to say that the High Court is wrong in finding that this village was the self-acquired property of Jaswant. The question turns on transactions [291] which took place in the year 1852. In 1836 Khuman the father of Jaswant executed a simple mortgage of Bakewar to Lachman Das. In 1839 he executed a second mortgage by way of conditional sale to the father of Kunjbehari. Disputes arose between the two mortgagees, who under an award were put into possession each of a moiety. In 1847 Kunjbehari bought out Lachman and was placed in sole possession. In 1852 one Harbans Rai, a creditor of Jaswant who had then succeeded to the property, got a decree against him. In the same year Kunjbehari applied for foreclosure under Regulation XVII of 1806. The year of grace expired, and the foreclosure became absolute. Harbans endeavoured to execute his decree against Bakewar; but was opposed by Kunjbehari who brought a suit against both Jaswant and Harbans to assert his title. The First Court decided against him, apparently on the ground that his title was no better than that of Lachman whose simple mortgage did not carry the right to foreclosure or to possession. The Zillah Judge thought differently, and held that the mortgage has been finally foreclosed. Harbans appealed to the Sudder Dewani Adawlat, who upheld the Zillah Judge's decree and granted Kunjbehari's claim to have the sale of the estate of Bakewar made absolute by expungement of the name of Jaswant and the entry of his own name. That final decree bears date the 14th February 1856. Kunjbehari was then in possession and he remained in possession, but he did not procure any mutation of name.

The subsequent events are involved in some obscurity. It seems that Kunjbehari got into trouble during the mutiny; that he was charged with serious offences and was in great danger of being hung; that Jaswant took up his cause, saved his life, and even gave him compensation to the amount of some thousands of rupees for injuries done to his estate (Rec., p. 274). On Kunjbehari's part we find that in an irregular way, by endorsement on the decree of February 1856, he purported to annul that decree in favour of Adhar Kunwar. The consideration [292] stated is the sum of Rs. 4,526 apparently less than a year's revenue. That endorsement is dated 22nd June 1858. The defendant alleges that soon afterwards Adhar Kunwar, also in an irregular way, made a verbal gift of the property to Jaswant (Rec., p. 480). The certain thing is that about this time Jaswant regained possession and remained in possession until his death. How far his title depended on Adhar Kunwar's gift, how far on Kunjbehari's relinquishment of possession and practical reconveyance, and how far Kunjbehari's acceptance of the small sum given for purchase money was influenced by Jaswant's services to him or why he took so small a sum, are questions which are not and which need not be, cleared up.

The defendants were Jaswant and Sheo Narain, to whom it was stated that Jaswant had sold the property. Kunjbehari alleged that the endorsement on the decree was a forgery and gave a different account of his transactions with Adhar Kunwar; admitting however that he took the money from her and that he, as he calls it, annulled the decree. The Subordinate Judge held that the arrangement of the 22nd June 1858 was a bona fide one, and that Jaswant got actual proprietary possession. (Rec., p. 280.)

On one of the issues he found that the foreclosure of the decree of February 1856 and the other previous transaction between Kunjbehari and Jaswant were wholly fictitious and collusive. It is impossible to accept such a finding as of any value. Nobody disputes that Kunjbehari had a genuine mortgage from Khuman, or that the estate and the liability devolved on Jaswant. And the Subordinate Judge himself points out that the validity of the foreclosure was challenged by Harbans who had a strong interest to upset it; but he adds "unfortunately these objections" were not entertained by any Court." (R. c., p. 273.)

There is also another finding on a separate issue, of a most extraordinary character. The Subordinate Judge finds that because Kunjbehari did not effect a mutation of names therefore [293] his foreclosure decree became void and that he remained in possession as a mortgagee.

It is mainly on account of these two findings, on which Mr. Ross dwelt at great length, that this voluminous intricate and confused judgment of the Subordinate Judge of 1869 has been put in. Of course they have no legal force as between the heir and the grantee of Jaswant. Nor had they any result as between the parties to that suit; seeing that it was dismissed with costs. (Rec., p. 283.)

The decision of the District Judge in this case is apparently founded on the last-mentioned finding of the Subordinate Judge of 1869, which he quotes as though it were conclusive. Their Lordships think it clear that the point of time and the event to look at is the foreclosure of 1853. If that were a mere sham, the conclusion that the mortgage continued and that on its payment Jaswant only redeemed the estate he had inherited from Khuman might have some colour. But in the suit of 1853 the two appellate Courts held that the foreclosure was genuine and valid. That was held against the appeal of the execution creditor whose claim was defeated by it. It is not a decision between the present parties, but it is strong evidence, and their Lordships cannot find any substantial evidence for disputing it. If the foreclosure took place the former title of Bakewar was broken and its ancestral character destroyed. The exact mode of its re-acquisition by Adhar Kunwar and Jaswant is not material. For money or for services, it passed from Kunjbehari to Jaswant and so was acquired by him. For the above reasons their Lordships agree with the High Court on this point.

The only other point taken for the appellant is one of a very unusual character. It is alleged that the decree of the High Court is void because one of the Judges, Mr. Burkitt, was not properly appointed. The point was not taken in the Court below; nor is the nature of it explained in the printed case of the appellant. Their Lordships understand that the appointment is questioned on the ground that it was not made immediately [294] upon, or within a reasonable time after, the occurrence of the vacancy which it supplied. Their Lordships cannot discover any ground for the objection. Under the High Courts Act the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-Western Provinces has power to appoint an acting Judge upon the happening of a vacancy among the puisne Judges of the Court. No limit of time is mentioned within which the appointment shall be made. That is left to the discretion of the Lieutenant-Governor, and it is not competent to a Court of Law to invent a restriction not contemplated by the Legislature.

The result is that the appeals fail on all points, and their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to dismiss them. The appellant must pay the costs.

THIS was an appeal under s. 10 of the Letters Patent from an order dismissing an application for the restoration to the [295] file of pending appeals of an appeal which had been dismissed. The appeal was a second appeal, which under the Rules of the Court came for hearing before a single Judge. The circumstances under which it was dismissed are indicated by the following order:—"This appeal is not supported. The pleader for the appellant has made over his brief to another gentleman when the appeal was called on for the second time. The latter says he is unable to argue the case. I dismiss the appeal with costs." The appellant applied to the Judge who passed the above order for restoration of the appeal as an appeal dismissed for default. This application was rejected by the following order:—"This case cannot be reinstated. It was not dismissed for default. Rejected." The appellant thereupon appealed under s. 10 of the Letters Patent.

was unable to argue the case: the appeal was accordingly dismissed. An application was then presented to the learned Judge who heard and decided the case praying that the appeal might be restored to its original number and heard in the ordinary course. The order passed was:—"This case cannot be reinstated: it was not dismissed for default." It is contended before us to-day that under the circumstances the case is one which was practically dismissed for default and should have been so treated. In support of this contention, the case of Shankar Dat Dube v. Radha Krishna (1) was cited.

The circumstances, however, of that case differ materially from the circumstances in the appeal before us. In that case, the pleader who had been retained by the defendant came before the Court and stated that no one had ever come near him on the part of his client, and he had no instructions of any kind. His case was rightly treated as one in which the pleader engaged had retired [296] from the case. In the appeal before us, there was no retirement. The learned vakil who was engaged came forward with instructions in his hand and said he was unable to argue the case. From an affidavit which was filed along with the application for reinstatement the cause of inability is stated to be that the brief had come to the hands of the vakil so late that he could not prepare himself to argue the case. That, as pointed out in the case of Ram Chanara Pandurang Naik v. Madhav Purushottam Naik (2), was a good reason to pray for an adjournment, but it was not a retirement from the case, and not a default of appearance. We were also referred to Rakhai Chundra Rai Chowdhuri v. The Secretary of State or India in Council (3). That case, no doubt, supports the contention of the appellant, but we find ourselves unable to follow it. We prefer to follow the ruling of the Bombay Court, with which we are in accord. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

[297] THIS was an application for revision of a decree made by the Subordinate Judge of Meerut, in an appeal from the Munsif of that place. It appears that the plaintiff, applicant, purchased at an auction-sale certain landed property belonging to the defendant's father. He got the defendant ejected from that land by proceedings under s. 36 of Act No. XII of 1881. He then brought a suit in the Court of the Munsif to recover from the defendant compensation for the use and occupation by the defendant of the land so purchased by him, alleging that, as the rent of the land had not been hitherto determined, the claim was not entertainable by a Court of Revenue. The defendant pleaded inter alia that the claim was not cognizable by a Civil Court. The Court of first instance, (Munsif of Meerut) held that the suit was cognizable by a Civil Court and gave the plaintiff a decree. The defendant appealed. The lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Meerut) held that the suit would not lie in a Civil Court, and, reversing the decree of the Munsif, dismissed the plaintiff's suit. Against this decree, the present application for revision was presented on behalf of the plaintiff.

Babu Jivan Chandar Mukerji, for the applicant.

The opposite party was not represented.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BURKITT, J:—This was a suit for compensation for the use and occupation of agricultural land. Judging from the record, the plaintiff had purchased the zamindari rights of the defendant's father. Whether the land in respect of the occupation of which compensation is claimed was sir land of the ex-zamindar, we do not know. One thing is clear. The plaintiff had, by proceeding under s. 36 of Act No. XII of 1881, obtained the ejectment of the defendant from the lands to which this claim relates. He could not have obtained ejectment under such a proceeding unless the defendant had been a tenant of this agricultural land. The plaintiff, if he wanted to get a decree for rent and did not agree with the defendant as to the rent to be paid whilst the defendant was his tenant, ought to have got the [298] rent determined whilst the tenancy subsisted by an application under Act No. XII of 1881. Mr. Jivan Chandar argues that, the rent not having been determined during the tenancy and not having been agreed on, the Court of Revenue would not now determine it. The Court of Revenue would of course act wisely in not determining the rent of a tenancy which no longer subsisted; it has other work to do. Mr. Jivan Chandar also contended that, on the authority of the decisions of Mr. Justice Tyrrell in Brijbawan Singh v. Mehdi Ali (1) and Ranjit Singh v. Diwan Singh (2), it was competent to a Civil Court in such a case, although it could not decree the claim sub nomine rent, to award to the plaintiff compensation for the use of his land by the defendant. Mr. Justice Tyrrell apparently had forgotten that he had delivered the judgment of a Bench of two Judges in 1882, which was directly in conflict with the view which he was expressing in 1887 and 1889. Sir Robert Stuart, C.J., and Mr. Justice Tyrrell in Ram Prasad v. Dina Kuar (3) held, and we think rightly, that in such a case the zamindar cannot sue for use and occupation. If he wants to enforce payment of rent by his tenant, he must agree on the rent with his tenant, if the case be one in which such an agreement would be lawful under, and not contrary to, the provisions of Act No. XII of 1881 and could be enforced under that Act, or he must have the rent determined under the Act, and then he could sue for the arrears of the rent so agreed on by the tenant or determined under the Act, and he could sue in the Court of Revenue, which is the only Court having jurisdiction. This view of the law is supported by the judgment of this Court in Radha Prasad Singh v. Jugal Das (1). Some decisions bearing on this subject are referred to in Debi Singh v. Jhanno Kuar (2). Zamindars must comply with the law of Act No. XII of 1881, or they will go without remedy, not only in the Court of Revenue, but also in the Civil Court, in respect of [299] compensation for the occupation of their land. This case came before us as an application in revision from the judgment of a Civil Court dismissing the suit. We dismiss this application.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J. and BURKITT, J.—This is an application asking the Court to revise, under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure, an order of the Subordinate Judge of Gorakhpur rejecting an application for leave to sue as a pauper. The applicant alleged that he was the eldest chela of the deceased mahant; that whilst he was on a pilgrimage the mahant died and the proposed defendant to the suit had wrongfully usurped the gaddi and the position of mahant of the temple, and the applicant alleged that he was entitled to the gaddi by law and custom. [300] We may observe here that that was a very loose allegation. In nearly all these cases of succession to the gaddis of temples the succession is governed by the custom of the class to which the temple is appropriated. Sometimes the mahant nominates his successor, and that successor on the death of the mahant becomes entitled by virtue of the nomination. In other cases the successor is appointed by the representative of the founder of the temple. In others again the successor is appointed by the mahants of the neighbouring temples, but the instances we have given are not exhaustive of the customs which have been found to apply in such cases. Consequently the mere allegation that a claimant is entitled by law and custom to the gaddi of a temple is not in our opinion a sufficient allegation of title. Something more than general allegations are requisite in the plaint where a claim is made to the possession of property which is in the possession of another person, always of course provided that the case is not one falling under s. 9 of the Specific Relief Act. The case of Philipps v. Philipps (1) and that of Dawkins v. Lord Penrhyn (2) are instructive as to the law on this subject in England.

The Subordinate Judge examined, under s. 406 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the applicant regarding the merits of his claim. The fact that he was a pauper was not disputed. It appeared from the examination that, according to one custom at least affecting the particular temple, a jar with water in it was placed on the gaddi in the event of the mahant dying during the absence of the person entitled to succeed him on the gaddi. This is not alleged to have been done in the present case, and it also appeared that the defendant had taken possession of the gaddi without any serious opposition on the part of the panches of the temple. On these facts the Subordinate Judge came to the conclusion that the applicant had not shown a prima facie reasonable cause of action, and rejected the application for leave to sue as a pauper.

[301] It has been contended that this case comes within the ruling of the Bombay High Court in Venkubai v. Lakshman Venkoba Khot (3). It appears to us that that case does not apply here. Here the Judge addressed himself to the question of whether or not the applicant had shown grounds from which it might be inferred that he had a probable cause of action. It is obvious that the mere statements in the plaint which accompanies an application for leave to sue as a pauper cannot be accepted as the sole materials on which a decision as to whether the applicant's allegations do or do not show a right to sue can depend. If the allegations in the plaint were the sole matters to be looked to and the applicant were admittedly a pauper, the granting of this application to sue as a pauper would depend, not on whether he had any merits to go upon, but on the skill of the gentleman who drafted his petition and his plaint, and the examination as to the merits under s. 406 would be superfluous.

It has been held by this Court in Chattarnal Singh v. Raja Ram (4) that clause (c) of s. 407 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not refer solely to a question of jurisdiction, but that the applicant must make out that he has a good, subsisting prima facie cause of action capable of enforcement in Court and calling for an answer. That Full Bench ruling was cited with approval by Jardine, J., in Dulari v. Vallabdas Pragji (5), and even if the Madras Court in Koka Ranganayaka Annal v. Kaka Venkatachellapati Nayudu (6) took a different view, we are bound to follow the Full Bench ruling of our own Court. We may say that we entirely approve of that Full Bench ruling. Further, the Madras Court in Vijendra Tirtha Swami v. Sudhindra Thirtha Swami (1) did not follow the case in I. L. R., 4 Mad. 323. Assuming the Full Bench ruling to be correct, as we do, it was within the jurisdiction of the Subordinate Judge to decide whether or not the applicant's allegations showed a right to sue. It has been held by their [302] Lordships of the Privy Council in Rajah Amir Hassan Khan v. Sheo Bakhsh Singh (2) that where a Court has jurisdiction to decide a question, and does decide it, the High Court cannot under s. 622 of the Code of Civil Procedure interfere merely because the Court has wrongly decided the question. There is no question in this case of illegality or material irregularity. The result is that the Subordinate Judge had jurisdiction to decide this question and did decide it. He was not guilty of any illegality or irregularity, and it is unnecessary to consider whether he decided the question rightly or wrongly. We cannot interfere. We dismiss this application with costs.

Execution of decree—Act No. IV of 1882 (Transfer of Property Act), s. 89—Order absolute for sale—Limitation Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. II, art. 179.

An application for an order absolute for sale under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, is an application to which article 179 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, applies. *Owih Behari Lal v. THIS appeal arose out of an application for an order absolute for sale under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882. The respondent obtained a decree for sale under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act on the 30th of March 1893 against the appellant. By the decree six months were allowed for payment of the decretal sum. That period expired on the 30th of September 1893. On the 10th of March 1897, the respondent decree-holder applied for an order for sale under s. 89 of the [303] Transfer of Property Act. That was the first application made for execution of the decree or to take a step in aid of the execution of the decree. The Court of first instance (Munsif of Bisauli) held that the application was barred by limitation. On appeal by the decree-holder the lower appellate Court (Subordinate Judge of Shahjahanpur) held, following the decision in Ranbir Singh v. Drigpal (4), that the application was not barred, and, reversing the decree of the Munsif, made an order of remand under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure. From that order of remand the judgment-debtor appealed to the High Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BANERJI, J.—On the 30th of March 1893 the respondent here obtained a decree under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, against the appellant here. By the decree six months were allowed for payment of the decretal sum. That period expired on the 30th of September 1893. On the 10th of March 1897, the respondent-decree-holder applied for an order for sale under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act. That was the first application made for the execution of the decree or to take a step in aid of the execution of the decree. The first Court held that the application was barred by the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and dismissed it. On appeal the lower appellate Court held, following the decision in Ranbir Singh v. Drigpal (1) that there was no period of limitation provided for such an application, and set aside the order of the first Court and made an order under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure remanding the case. From that order of remand this appeal has been brought. A Full Bench of this Court has held in Oudh Behari Lal v. Nageshar Lal (2) that an application for an order under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act is a proceeding in execution of decree and subject to the rules of procedure governing such matters. Applying the decision of the [304] Full Bench, we hold that an application for an order under s. 89 of the Transfer of Property Act is an application to which art. 179 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, applies, and consequently, having regard to s. 4 of the Act, the application was rightly dismissed by the first Court. If we were to hold that there was no limitation in such a case the decree-holder might postpone without loss of any rights his application under s. 89 for fifty years after the date when he obtained his decree under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, as there would be nothing in the Limitation Act to bar his application, and s. 230 of the Code of Civil Procedure would not apply. We allow this appeal with costs in this Court and in the Court below, and set aside the order under appeal, dismiss the appeal to the Court below, and restore and affirm the decree of the first Court.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C.J., and BANERJI, J.—This appeal arises out of proceedings taken for the execution of a decree. A decree for sale [305] was made under s. 88 of the Transfer of Property Act, 1882, on the 31st of March 1891. An order absolute for sale was made on the 17th of December 1892, under s. 89 of that Act. On the 23rd of January 1893, an application for execution was made. On the 1st of July 1893, the judgment-debtor paid into Court the amount decreed, which included costs. On the 5th of July 1893, the decree-holder, having found that by the judgment he was entitled to a sum of about Rs. 1,000 more than the decree had given him, applied under s. 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure to have the decree brought into accordance with the judgment. For some reason best known, if known at all, to the Judge to whom that application was made, he shelved the application on the 18th of November 1893. On the 28th of November 1895, the decree-holder made a second application under s. 206 to the same effect as the previous one, and on the 25th of July 1896, the decree was brought into accordance with the judgment. The decree-holder delayed making his next application until the 17th of March 1897. It was for execution of the decree as amended. That application was dismissed on the ground that it was barred by limitation. From the order dismissing that application this appeal has been brought. Unless the decree-holder is entitled to call in aid his applications of the 5th of July 1893, and the 28th of November 1895, as applications to the proper Court to take a step-in-aid of the execution of the decree, execution of the decree is barred by limitation under art 179 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, as the last application to execute the decree was that of the 23rd of January 1893.

In Kishen Sahai v. The Collector of Allahabad (1) it was held that an application under s. 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure to bring a decree into accordance with the judgment was substantially an application for a review of judgment and gave, under s. 167 of sch. ii of Act No. IX of 1871, a fresh starting point for limitation. We cannot regard [306] proceedings under s. 206 of the Code as of the same nature in any respect as proceedings under s. 623 of the Code. In the former case, namely, under s. 206, the correctness of the judgment is not questioned; it is assumed; but the jurisdiction arises from the fact that the decree as drawn up and signed is not in accordance with the judgment. In the latter case, namely, under s. 623, not only the correctness of the decree, but the correctness of the judgment is questioned, and, if the application under s. 623 is allowed, a re-hearing of the suit or appeal to which it refers becomes necessary. In the former case there is no re-hearing. That part of the decision in Kishen Sahai v. The Collector of Allahabad to which we have referred was explained by Straight, J., in Kallu Rai v. Fahiman (1) on the ground that, though ostensibly the application in Kishen Sahai v. The Collector of Allahabad had been made under s. 206 of the Code, the proceedings which were taken were proceedings which could only have been taken under s. 623 of the Code. We need not consider whether that explanation is correct or not. The decision in Kallu Rai v. Fahiman shows that an application under s. 206 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not give a fresh starting point to limitation, and cannot be regarded as an application to a proper Court to take a step-in-aid of execution. That this is so is obvious from a consideration of art. 179, cl. (4) of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877. The application under that clause must be one in accordance with law made to "the proper Court" for execution or to take some step-in-aid of execution of the decree. By explanation II to art. 179 "proper Court" means the Court whose duty it is to execute the decree. The Court executing a decree may or may not be the Court which would have jurisdiction to take action on an application under s. 206 of the Code, and, even if it was the Court which passed the decree, its functions as a Court executing the decree are not the same as its functions were as the Court making the [307] decree. In executing the decree the Court executing it must take the decree as it finds it. It cannot amend the decree or alter it in any way. It is bound of course to construe the decree. The decree in execution may be the decree of the High Court, and the proper Court to execute that decree may be the Court of the Munsif by whom the suit was first decided. The Munsif could not act under s. 206 in respect of a decree made by an appellate Court, and he would be bound, as the Court executing the decree, to execute the decree whether he approved of it or not, even if the decree had been one made by himself. For these reasons we are of opinion that the applications of the 5th of July 1893, and the 28th of November 1895, were not applications made to the proper Court within the meaning of art. 179 to take a step-in-aid of execution of the decree, and consequently that execution of the decree was barred by limitation. It was decided, and we think rightly, in Tarsi Ram v. Man Singh (2) that an application under s. 206 of the Code does not give a fresh starting point for limitation. We dismiss this appeal with costs.

(1) 4 A. 137.

(2) 8 A. 492.

(3) 13 A. 124.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—Muhammad Shah Khan, who was a clerk or muharrir at the thana of Didauli, and Kutb-ud-din, who was the thanadar, were tried for the offences punishable under s. 204 and 218 of the Indian Penal Code. Kutb-ud-din was acquitted; the Government has appealed against that acquittal, and that appeal is before us. Muhammad Shah Khan was convicted of the offence punishable under s. 204 of the Indian Penal Code and was sentenced therefor to two years' rigorous imprisonment. He has appealed, and his appeal is now before us.

The facts of this case, although the evidence was taken at considerable length, are very simple. A dacoity had been committed on the night of the 24th-25th of May, and in that dacoity one Abdul Wahid, who was the zamindar's karinda, was injured rather severely. He first went to make his report to the thana at Amroha, apparently because he had been told that a difficulty had arisen about one Roshan belonging to the village getting a report made as to a previous dacoity alleged to have taken place in the same village on the night of the 23rd. He was directed at Amroha to make his report at the thana of Didauli, within the circle of which thana the village in question was. He arrived at the thana late at night, and made a statement to the thanadar; and early the next morning, he made a report. He says in his evidence that he mentioned that two dacoities had been committed, and that he signed a book three times, and that later on they again put before him a book for his signature and he again signed it two or three times. He says that he did not take away any cheque-receipt. A cheque-book which was printed at the Government Press in 1891 was produced in Court, and [309] in that cheque-book there was a counterfoil taken from a cheque-book which was printed at the Government Press in 1892, and which otherwise shows on the face of it that it was of a different issue from that of the cheque-book of 1891. On the interpolated counterfoil, there was what purported to be a report by Abdul Wahid, of a theft committed by three persons in the village. According to that report, after the three men had put the grain and other things into their bags, Abdul Wahid and his servant awoke, and in trying to seize the men were hurt. That report bears the genuine signature of Abdul Wahid. He says that that was not the report which he made, and we have no doubt that it was not. There must have been some strong motive to induce the thanadar and the clerk to concoct the report on a sheet of a cheque-book of the issue of 1892, to get Abdul Wahid's signature to that report and to substitute that report for the report which was first recorded and signed by Abdul Wahid. No explanation is given by Muhammad Shah Khan or Kutb-ud-din of how it happened that in the cheque-book of the issue of 1891, a sheet of the issue of 1892 has found a place. No reasonable man could believe that when the cheque-book of 1891 was being bound a sheet from a cheque-book printed the following year was inserted by mistake, and that by a fortuitous concurrence of circumstances, the report which is questioned in this case happened to be written on the sheet which, by mistake, had got into the wrong book in binding. Further, all the other sheets in the book of the issue of 1891 have the mark of three holes where the binding string has passed through them. The sheet from the book of 1892 has got three holes corresponding with the holes in the book of 1891, and in addition three other holes which do not correspond with any of the holes in the book of 1891. These are facts which speak for themselves.

The report made in the cheque-book was a report which the muharrir or clerk, according to the Police Regulations, was bound to report correctly word for word as it fell from the man making the report, and it was a report which, according to the same [310] Police Regulations, the officer-in-charge of the thana was bound to sign, with the object of making the two men responsible for the correctness of the report. Consequently, it was a report which, in our opinion, must be taken to have been recorded by the two men. Further, as the report was signed by the person making it, namely, Abdul Wahid, the document bearing his signature would have been admissible in a Court of Justice to contradict any statement which he might make at variance with the report and might for that purpose be sent for on a subpoena and could have been proved, if necessary, by the thanadar and the clerk in whose presence it was made and signed. No doubt, the object in preparing the false report and substituting it for the true report, was to keep from the knowledge of the District Superintendent of Police and the Magistrate of the District, the fact that two dacoities were reported to have taken place in a village in the district. The offence, in our opinion, was a very serious one. It is in the interest of the public necessary that these reports should be recorded faithfully and truly by police officers. It is to the injury of the public that offences should be concealed by the police, and that reports should be falsely recorded. We bear in mind in dealing with the appeal of Muhammad Shah Khan, that he is a young man, and that what he did was done no doubt at the suggestion and by the orders of the thanadar. However, we cannot pass over his offence lightly. We dismiss his appeal; but we alter the sentence to one of 12 months' rigorous imprisonment, which will count from the date of his conviction in the Court of Session. As to Kutb-ud-din, he was the responsible officer at the thana. It was his duty not only to show a good example of acting lawfully, but to take care, as far as he could, that those under him at the thana acted according to law. There is, in our opinion, a wide difference between his case and that of his subordinate Muhammad Shah Khan. We convict Kutb-ud-din of the offence punishable under s. 204 of the Indian Penal Code; he certainly secreted or destroyed the first signed report; and we sentence him under that section to be rigorously imprisoned for [311] two years. We convict him also of the offence punishable under s. 218 of the Indian Penal Code; he framed a record which he knew to be incorrect knowing it to be likely that he would thereby cause injury to the public. The record in respect of which we convict him under s. 218 was the false record to which he obtained the signature, on the second

SHAH MUHAMMAD KHAN AND OTHERS (Defendants) v. HANWANT SINGH (Plaintiff).† [12th February, 1898.]

Civil Procedure Code, s. 108—Application to set aside a decree passed ex parte—Limitation—Act No. XI of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, art. 164—Suit for partition—Nature of decree in such suit—Civil Procedure Code, s. 396—Execution of process for enforcing the judgment.

The action of an Amin appointed under s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure in a partition suit to demarcate the shares assigned to the respective parties to the suit is not the executing of a process for enforcing the judgment within the meaning of article 164 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. Dwarkanath Misser v. Barinda Nath Misser (1) referred to.

IN this case, the respondent obtained on the 30th September 1896, a decree for partition of certain immoveable non-revenue-paying property against Shah Muhammad Khan and others. This decree was a decree of an interlocutory nature not capable of execution until the actual shares of the parties to it had been properly demarcated by means of the procedure prescribed by s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure. An application, [312] described by the Court which passed the decree (Subordinate Judge of Meerut) as an application for execution, was made by the respondent on the 13th of February, 1897, in pursuance of which an Amin was sent to prepare lots for partition. The Amin on the 3rd and 4th of March, 1897, made a survey of the property and prepared lots, and on the 18th of March returned a report to the Court, on the basis of which report notice was issued to the defendants fixing the 17th of April, 1897, for the allotment amongst the parties of the lots prepared by the Amin. On that date some of the defendants applied under s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to have the decree of the 30th of September, 1896, set aside, as having been passed ex parte without due notice having been served upon him. This application was dismissed by the Subordinate Judge as barred by limitation, he being of opinion that the sending of the Amin to demarcate the lots was the "executing of a process for enforcing the judgment" within the meaning of art. 164 of the second schedule to the Indian Limitation Act, 1877. Against this order of dismissal, the applicants appealed to the High Court.

Munshi Ram Prasad, for the appellants.

Pandit Moti Lal, for the respondent.

JUDGMENT.

EDGE, C. J., and BURKITT, J.—This appeal has arisen in a suit for the partition of immoveable property not paying revenue to Government. The Court in which the suit was made a decree for partition, which we must construe as an interlocutory decree, but a decree nevertheless within the meaning of s. 2 of the Code of Civil Procedure, defining the interests of the parties to the suit; that is, it was in effect an interlocutory decree declaring the interests of the parties. Now, in suits for partition of immoveable property not paying revenue to Government, the Court, no doubt, if it has the information before it necessary to enable it to make a decree not only declaring the rights of the parties but actually fixing the particular areas, or rooms, or parts of the houses, as the case may be, of which possession is to be given to the parties respectively on partition, may make such a decree [313] without employing the procedure of s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the decree so made would be enforceable in execution, and possession of the respective areas, rooms, &c., could be given to the parties in execution of the decree. But where, as most generally happens, a Court has not the information necessary to the making of such a decree, it must make a preliminary or interlocutory decree of a declaratory nature, and then adopt the procedure of s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure by appointing a commissioner or commissioners, whose duty will be, not to give possession, for at that period there would be no decree capable of execution by possession, but who should allot such shares to the parties, award the sums to be paid in case sums are to be paid, and then prepare and sign a report appointing the shares and distinguishing such shares by metes and bounds, if ordered so to do. The commissioner or commissioners must then submit that report to the Court, and the Court, after giving the parties an opportunity of objecting to the report, may quash the report and proceedings of the commissioner or commissioners and issue a new commission, or pass a decree in accordance with the report. The decree in accordance with such report would be a decree allotting the specific shares, areas, rooms, &c., distinguishing them where possible by metes and bounds or other adequate description, and decreeing to the respective parties possession of those portions of the property allotted to them. In the latter case which we have been putting that would be the final decree. It is true that the interlocutory decree—following the principle laid down by their Lordships of the Privy Council—would be appealable, but for all that it is not the final decree or the decree which is capable of execution, except possibly for such costs as it might award to be paid. It is merely of the character of an interlocutory and declaratory decree. In such a case as the present, which falls under the second category, the appointment of a commissioner, whether he be the amin of the Court or some one else, is not the issuing of a process in execution of a decree, nor are any proceedings of such commissioner [314] the carrying out of any process in execution. The time has not yet arrived for execution of the decree. It was in our opinion correctly decided by the High Court at Calcutta in Dwarka Nath Misser v. Barinda Nath Misser (1) that proceedings under s. 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure for the purpose of effecting partition are proceedings in the suit itself and not proceedings in execution of a decree.

In the present case a decree, which we must regard as simply declaratory and interlocutory, was made in the absence of the defendants, who are appellants here. All these appellants with one exception were minors. They applied for an order to set aside the decree under s. 108 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The Court considering that the appointment of an amin under s. 396, under which section only at the stage of the case he could have been appointed to act, was the issuing of a process for enforcing the judgment, and that the action of the amin in proceeding to the place and making the allotment was the executing of a process for enforcing the judgment, applied art. 164 of the second schedule of the Indian Limitation Act, 1877, and dismissed the application. There has been in this case no execution of a process for enforcing the judgment. The application was within time. We set aside the order of the Court below with costs and remand the case under s. 562 of the Code of Civil Procedure to that Court to be disposed of on the merits.

Appeal decreed and cause remanded.

BATUL BEGAM (Plaintiff) v. MANSUR ALI KHAN AND OTHERS
(Defendants).^{*} [16th February, 1898.]

Pre-emption—Suit for pre-emption based on a mortgage by conditional sale—Limitation—Act No. XV of 1877 (Indian Limitation Act), sch. ii, arts. 10 and 120—“Physical possession.”

Held (1) that, the other conditions being present necessary to make art. 10 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877 applicable, art. 10 would apply to a sale which in its inception was a mortgage by conditional sale, but which, either by the operation of Regulation No. XVII of 1806 or by the operation of Act No. IV of 1882, had become in effect an absolute sale with the right of redemption gone.

(2) That in such a case as above limitation begins to run, where Regulation No. XVII of 1806 applies, from the expiry of the year of grace.

(3) That a share in an undivided zamindari mahal is not susceptible of “physical possession” in the sense of art. 10 of the second schedule to Act No. XV of 1877.

(4) That constructive possession, e.g., by receipt of rent from tenants, is not “physical possession” within the meaning of said article.
